WOMAN'S BOARD PRAYER MEETING.

PILGRIM HALL, CONGREGATIONAL HOUSE, BOSTON, APRIL 10.

Mrs. Joshua Coit presided and read the account of the resurrection from Matt. 28, with passages from Daniel and Revelation, all in harmony with the blessed season of Easter week and with the calendar topic for the day, Joy in Missionary Service, joy because of the glorious Leader whose promises are many and sure, and who lives to be not only Saviour but intercessor and burden bearer.

Miss Lizzie Webb of Adana was introduced and responded to the hymn just sung, "Watchman, tell us of the night," strong in the belief that even in Turkey "the morning seems to dawn," and that after all the darkness, in which the gleams of brightness have been the faith which has stood so severe a test, the day will break. Her intense manner as she told the story of an Aintab boy, who through the tortures of a cruel death persistently declared, "I cannot deny my Lord," will not soon be forgotten. Miss Webb expects to return to Adana during the summer.

It was stated that in the case of Rev. George P. Knapp, who has been expelled from Bitlis under false accusations, the United States government has taken prompt and satisfactory measures.

Mrs. Kellogg alluded to the recent death of Mrs. H. H. Hyde, for many years a devoted friend of missions and one who was accustomed to frequent this meeting; and Mrs. Billings spoke of another aged saint who has just departed, who in a late interview asked, "What of missions?" "Am I really a life member of the Woman's Board?" "Am I a member of the auxiliary this year?" and who, as she listened to the story of Miss Gilson's setting out for Gazaland, referred to her own youthful days when she in spirit consecrated herself to mission work, but there was no Woman's Board then to send her to the foreign field.

Mrs. Judson Smith spoke of the increased responsibility resting upon those who remain as one generation of workers passes away, of the great wisdom needed by the executive committee of the Board and of the necessity of active co-operation on the part of all the constituency, especially in an exigency like the present, when during the last seven months of the financial year it will be necessary to raise by contributions three times as much as has been received from this source during the first five months of the year in order to meet the demands of the work for which the Board has pledged itself.

HEADACHE AND CONSTIPATION.—"I have been using Hood's Pills and prefer them to any others that I have ever tried. I have suffered for years with constipation and sick headache, but feel very much better since taking Hood's Pills, and I shall continue their use while they do me so much good." Mrs. Fred Baker, Clinton Road, Brookline, Mass.

PROPOSED CHANGES IN THE MEETINGS OF THE MASSACHUSETTS GENERAL ASSOCIATION.

The General Association will this year hold its annual meeting in the Central Church, Fall River, May 19–21. The local committee propose several new features for increasing the usefulness of the meeting.

One of the most radical changes in the order of procedure which is proposed refers to the reports of the various committees. The statement concerning ministerial relief will be made by Dr. Quint on Tuesday evening after the sermon and before the collection. The report on the revision of rules will be taken as a matter of business. The chairman on the work of the churches will be allowed twenty minutes for his report, and the remaining committees will be allowed five minutes each to state the points in their reports and to call attention to such portions as they may deem worthy of special importance.

Of course the final decision upon these changes will remain with the assembly itself. But it is not thought that the members will refuse to accept the recommendation of the committee, and give the new order a trial for at least one year. The opinion of the ministers has already been, to a great extent, secured, and it has been shown to be fairly emphatic. The chairman of the local committee sent out 500 postals, inquiring of the ministers whether or not they approved of the plan of presenting a printed copy of the report of each committee to the members on their arrival, and then taking these reports as read. The result is as follows: There have been 290 replies; of these 244, representing 48,846 members, say yes; 21, representing 3,956 members, say no; 11, representing 4,400 members are doubtful; while 14, representing 3,815 members, are non-committal. So that on the part of the ministers there is an overwhelming majority in favor of having no report save that which appears in print. Since these replies have been received the local committee have so far compromised the matter as to give the committee on the work of the churches an extra five minutes, or twenty minutes altogether, and the other committees five minutes each. The change, as we have said, is radical, but it is worth a trial. The aim is plainly to increase the interest of the meetings and to remove the ground of complaint, which has been so often heard, as to the want of attraction and the lack of profit at these annual gatherings.

The program which has been drawn up is both practical and crowded. There are no less than seven subjects which are to be introduced and discussed, each of which is to have at least one hour for consideration. The papers introducing the different subjects are not to exceed twenty minutes. An attractive program, reflecting much credit alike on the local committee and the denomination in the State, has been arranged. The friends at Fall River are arranging to offer to the ministers and delegates most generous hospitality. They propose to provide bed and breakfast for every member, and their plan includes dinner and supper in the Music Hall, which is close by, at seventy-five cents a day, or forty cents for dinner and thirty-five cents for supper. The advantage of this plan will be that all the brethren will dine and sup together, thus adding social festivity to all the other attractions of the meetings. Those who intend to dine or take supper with the rest will be requested to intimate beforehand, that it may be known what number to provide for. It is hoped that the delegates will be appointed at once and intimation, giving the names and addresses of those who expect to be present, forwarded to the local secretary. We understand that the local committee will not, under any circumstances, guarantee to find homes for those who do not write for them before Saturday, May 16.

COLORADO COLLEGE.

The trustees of this institution have now set themselves to work in earnest to secure the $60,000 still needed to obtain Dr. Pearsons's offer of $50,000 if $150,000 are in hand in good pledges or in cash by Commencement this year. While recognizing the immense value of library buildings, of libraries, and everything in the way of equipment, Dr. Pearsons feels that endowments must be in productive funds, that it is useless to look for income from money invested in buildings or scholarships. He wants the institutions he aids to have money so invested that it will yield a regular income every year, something upon which one can depend for support. The expenses of Colorado College are now about $26,000 a year. Nearly $10,000 a year for the past five years have been obtained by annual subscriptions on the part of friends in the East. If the proposed endowment is completed, and it looks as if it would be, it will be possible for the college to take such forward steps as her opportunities demand. At a recent meeting of the trustees several conditional subscriptions of $5,000 were made, and the hope is cherished that the sum needed will be pledged in Colorado itself. Evidently the time is coming when, so far as possible, institutions will be compelled to depend upon their local constituency for their support and to withdraw their canvassers from New England and allow the latter to endow its own institutions like South Hadley, whose graduates ought to lose no time in efforts to get the money still lacking to bring up the capital of their alma mater to at least $250,000 Of course such colleges as Whitman must be helped by Eastern benevolence. So, too, such institutions as the college at Kingfisher, Okl., which will be brought into some prominence by the laying of the corner stone of one of its buildings, May 3, in connection with the exercises of the Annual Association, which this year meets with the Kingfisher Church. The rapid growth of these Western institutions is shown by the fact that Colorado College was not chartered till 1874, that President Slocum did not enter upon his work till 1888, that since that time nearly all the substantial advance in the work of the college has been made. With 300 students coming from twenty-two States, Colorado is in about the position occupied by Amherst twenty-five years ago, only she is striving to do her work with about one-quarter of the capital then possessed by her sister institution in Massachusetts. Give her the money now imperatively needed and the buildings for the development of her scientific department, and she will speedily become the Amherst of the Central West. Situated in a town of 15,000 people, with a campus of sixty acres, with buildings of which any institution might be proud, and a Cripple Creek not far off with its suggestion of resources sometime to be available for learning, it is easy to forecast the future of a school like this.

FRANKLIN.

THE RAGE TODAY.—The rage for Chippendale furniture has settled down into a permanent fashion. Chippendale designs are in great vogue, and one of the best specimens that has been seen in Boston this year is now on exhibition at the Paine warerooms on Canal Street. It is in the form of a cabinet sideboard, and is an unusually inexpensive piece of furniture.

TOURS ABROAD.—Messrs. Raymond & Whitcomb announce six tours through Europe and one (their third) to Japan for the coming summer and autumn. The former are devoted largely to Northern and Central Europe at a time when those regions are especially inviting, a voyage through the Norway fjords and to the North Cape, the Land of the Midnight Sun being one of the special features. This same party will also visit Russia. The tour of Japan is very comprehensive, and incidentally southern China and the Hawaiian Islands are seen. Special circulars—one for the European trips and another for the Japan tour—may be obtained by addressing Messrs. Raymond & Whitcomb, 296 Washington Street, Boston.

ANNIE M. MORSE.

Died in Brookline, March 18, Miss Annie M. Morse, daughter of Moses and Abbie M. Morse and sister of the late Mrs. W. H. Mason of Moultonboro, N. H. Her sudden death has overwhelmed her family with sorrow. An aged mother, who had looked to her as one on whom she could lean as the infirmities of age came on, and three brothers and two sisters are left to mourn her loss. The names of the surviving brothers and sisters are Fred M. Morse, Penacook, N. H., Frank H. Morse, Center Harbor, N. H., George H. Morse, Lynn, Mass., Mrs. F. N. Marden, Concord, N. H., and Mrs. A. V. Pettengill, Roxbury, Mass. Many friends, also, to whom she had endeared herself by her unselfish, generous, sympathetic and unassuming Christian character, mourn over her departure. Very early in life she became a Christian and united with the Methodist church in Moultonboro, N. H. In 1875 she, with her parents, moved to Penacook and united with the Congregational church there. Subsequently she went to Boston and soon identified herself with the church of her choice, the Shawmut, Dr. Griffis, pastor. The last two years of her life her church home was in the Walnut Avenue, Roxbury, Dr. A. H. Plumb, pastor.

The funeral services were held at Center Harbor, N. H., March 21, at 10.30 A.M. It can truly be said of her, "She hath done what she could."

MRS. HENRY H. HYDE,

Who died suddenly April 6, was first vice-president of the Boston Young Women's Christian Association, and a member of its board of managers for twenty-six years. The following resolutions have been passed by the directors of that institution:

Whereas, We, the managers of the Boston Young Women's Christian Association, have been called upon to part with the earthly presence and help of our co-worker for many years, therefore

Resolved, That while we shall miss the familiar face, her earnest sympathy and counsel, we would realize in this dispensation the loving care of an all-wise Providence, who has spared our sister the sorrow of physical feebleness and suffering and has called her to a sphere where her love of service to the Master may flow forth in full expression.

Resolved, That as her faithfulness has been our help, so will it continue to be our inspiration as we strive to carry forward the work for the association which she so dearly loved.

Resolved, That we extend our heartfelt sympathy to her family and express our hope that they will be sustained in this hour of earthly parting with the hope of a blessed reunion in the Father's kingdom.

MRS. ELIZABETH MANN.

Mrs. Elizabeth Mann, widow of Joseph Mann, died in Framingham, Mass., Saturday, April 11, aged 79 yrs., 2 mos. Thus quietly and peacefully closed the earthly life of a truly beloved and honored mother in Israel. Her early life had been spent in Boston, where she had been a professed Christian from her youth. For over forty years she has been one of the most active Christian workers in Plymouth Church in Framingham. She was thoroughly loyal to her own church, in whose Sabbath school she was for years a teacher, having many of the young ladies of the normal school in her Bible class. But her catholic spirit led her into intimate fellowship with many in other churches in the community, who love to tell of her tender ministrations to them in times of sorrow and suffering, as well as of delightful association with her in various lines of benevolent work. She had been a constant reader of The Congregationalist throughout her life. Compelled by increasing weakness to give up one after another her outside work and household cares, she retained to the last her interest in the best literature of the day, of which she had been a constant and intelligent reader. Losing her only child, a beautiful girl, years ago, her motherly heart made her home attractive to young people, who ever found her a genial and sympathetic friend. Her deep interest in all the missionary work of the church, her unfeigned faith in her divine Saviour, her unassuming piety, her cordial sympathy, her gentle charity, will long continue a holy inspiration to all who have enjoyed her friendship. "Strength and dignity were her clothing. She opened her mouth with wisdom, and the law of kindness was on her tongue."

MRS. MARTHA SWAN.

A life more than a century long is noteworthy of itself, and a life so full of the peace of God as was that of Mrs. Martha Swan, who died at Lee, Mass., on April 7, is deserving of notice. Mrs. Swan was born in a part of Methuen which is now within the limits of the city of Lawrence on Dec. 17, 1792. She received a better education than was generally given to girls at that time, and traveled to various parts of New England, which were then harder to reach than Europe is now. In 1822 she married Dr. James Swan, with whom she went to Philadelphia. Afterwards they removed to Westfield, New Haven, Ct., where they were among the founders of the Congregational church, and still later to Springfield, Mass., where Dr. Swan died in 1846. In 1868 she removed again to Lee, Mass., making her home with her youngest daughter, Mrs. J. L. Kilbon. In the home she was a constant benediction to all who were associated with her. Although blind for the last ten years of her life, she waited upon herself almost entirely until a year or two before her death, refusing all offers of assistance. Never loud in her protestations of love either for God or her friends, she left no doubt that her spiritual life was genuine and deep, and that those who came into contact with her were objects of a warm love. For some years she has been waiting, not impatiently, but willingly, for the call to depart, shrinking from the publicity that came with her advanced age, and feeling that her work on earth was done. Three children survive her—Mrs. William D. Brown of New York, William D. Swan of Philadelphia and Mrs. J. L. Kilbon of Lee. There are six grandchildren, among them Miss Helen Dawes Brown of New York, author of Two College Girls and other well-known books, and four great-grandchildren. Her life illustrates finely the blessedness of the righteous spoken of by Eliphaz, the Temanite, when he said, "Thou shalt come to thy grave in a full age, like as a shock of corn cometh in its season," and the higher blessedness promised in the Psalm, "With long life will I satisfy him, and show him my salvation."

science

Science is "knowing how." The only secret about Scott's Emulsion is years of science. When made in large quantities and by improving methods, an emulsion must be more perfect than when made in the old-time way with mortar and pestle a few ounces at a time. This is why Scott's Emulsion of cod-liver oil never separates, keeps sweet for years, and why every spoonful is equal to every other spoonful. An even product throughout.

In other emulsions you are liable to get an uneven benefit—either an over or under dose. Get Scott's. Genuine has a salmon-colored wrapper.

THE AMERICAN ORIENTAL SOCIETY.

Thursday, Friday and Saturday of last week the American Oriental Society was in session at Bartlet Chapel, Andover Theological Seminary. This was the 107th meeting of the society, though the first one in Andover. Pres. Daniel Coit Gilman of Johns Hopkins University presided and some thirty eminent philologists and archæologists were present, among them Professors Lanman, Lyon, Thayer and Toy of Harvard, Prof. Paul Haupt of Johns Hopkins, Prof. R. J. H. Gottheil of Columbia, Prof. D. B. Macdonald of Hartford Theological Seminary, Prof. T. T. Wright of the New Church Theological School, Boston, Profs. Moore, Taylor and Torrey of Andover, Dr. W. H. Ward of the Independent and Rabbi Gottheil of Temple Emanuel, New York city.

The contributions to Biblical scholarship were Professor Haupt's papers, one on the word ussharná [Ezra 5: 3, 9] and the other on Gen. 2: 6 and 4: 1, Professor Lyon's essay on The Argument from Silence in Discussions of Hebrew History and Literature, Professor Moore's explanation of the text and interpretation of Daniel 8: 9–14, and Dr. Torrey's monograph on The Origin of the Old Testament Apocryphon, called "I. Esdras." The meetings were well attended, the schedule of lectures at the seminary being so rearranged as not to interfere with the Oriental Society's program.

The Orientalists were entertained at the Mansion House, once the home of Mrs. Harriet Beecher Stowe. Two receptions were tendered them, one by Prof George Harris, who now occupies the house that was built for Dr. Moses Stuart, an officer of the society at the beginning of its career in 1842, and the other by Prof. George F. Moore, whose residence was for a long time the home of Prof. Austin Phelps and his daughter, Mrs. Elizabeth Stuart Phelps Ward.

Before adjourning the following officers were elected: President, Pres. D. C. Gilman; vice-presidents, Dr. W. H. Ward, Prof. C. H. Toy, and Prof. I. A. Hall; corresponding secretary, Prof. E. W. Hopkins; recording secretary, Prof. G. F. Moore; treasurer, H. C. Warren; librarian, Prof. A. Van Name; directors, Professors M. Bloomfield, R. J. H. Gottheil, P. Haupt, H. Hyorrnal, A. N. W. Jackson, M. Jastrow, Jr., and C. R. Lanman.

A Rain Song

AFTER long days of golden glare
How sweet the music of the rain!
And how ecstatic on the air
The cat-bird's silvery strain!

I see him in his cloistral gown,
This tuneful eremite in gray,
Swaying in rapture up and down
On yon althea spray!

His passionate runs and tremolos
Transcend the clearest notes of art,
As doth the peerless summer rose
Its winter counterpart.

His throat seems filled with lyric fire,
And listening there thrills me through
A touch of that divine desire
The elder poets knew.

My soul would search the secret springs
Where life's supremest meanings throng,
Would set sublime celestial things
To chords of earthly song.

A sudden mellow change, and lo!
The impulse like a ray is gone,
As from the clouds the vermeil glow
At the full burst of dawn.

Yet who shall say such sounds are sent
Unto the spirit-sense in vain?
Did it not hide some large intent,
That bird-song in the rain?

WE hope that the appeal which Secretary Barton has written and the American Board has issued in an illustrated pamphlet entitled Our Heroes in the Orient may be widely read and heeded. It sets forth the peculiarly direful effect which the Board's enforced retrenchment will have upon its missions in Turkey, and can hardly fail to move those to whom it is addressed. A similar appeal from the veteran missionary, Dr. Farnsworth, now on a furlough after forty-four years of missionary service, is printed in another column, and we hope no reader will miss the picture which it gives of the heroic quality of our representatives in Asia Minor, and of the withering and blighting consequences of the retrenchment which has been ordered. Let any one read Dr. Farnsworth's letter and then contrast it with Mr. Jones's letter from India, also published in this issue, and he will realize how great is the difference between the situation of our missionaries in India—ruled by Great Britain—and that of those who are enduring the rule of the Turk and his ally the Russian. "Has any missionary asked to be recalled because of the work of the Kurds?" asks Dr. Farnsworth, and proceeds to show that the missionaries dread the partial failure of home support more than they feared the fire and the scimiter. It is a magnificent exhibition of courage which the missionaries have shown, but its legitimate influence bids fair to be largely nullified by the reduction of aid which the poverty of the Board compels. If we have given for the relief of the Armenians we must also give for the upholding of the spiritual structure which we have so laboriously raised among them. Our home share of the Armenian trouble just now seems to be that of double help and contribution.

The officials of the American Missionary Association promptly instructed their attorneys to secure bondsmen and the release at once of the teachers in the Orange Park Normal and Industrial School, and to prepare to contest the case at the next term of the circuit court which meets in the fall. They propose to carry the case to the United States Supreme Court if necessary. This persecution of A. M. A. teachers calls to mind the trials which other of its servants have endured in the South since 1859. The names of Daniel Worth in North Carolina, John C. Fee and J. C. Richardson in Kentucky rise up and teach the lesson that it is futile for the South to attempt to prevent Christian men from sowing the seeds of knowledge and virtue among the outcast and despised. Mr. Worth was released by the North Carolina Supreme Court; Kentucky today is ashamed of its treatment of Mr. Fee and Mr. Richardson; Berea College flourishes, and a Congregational church stands today on the site of the mission school which Richardson founded and where he was mobbed.

Mr. Froude's lectures on the Council of Trent reviewed in another column suggest as a corollary the real reformation of the Roman Catholic Church extending to its life, though not its doctrine, and still continuing. Whoever would study in contemporary life the conditions of church and social law and usage as they were in Luther's time must go to one of the South American republics, where the priests are practically the dictators of the social as well as religious life of the people. Between the Roman Catholicism of Boston and that of Bogota there is practically a difference of four centuries, though not even in the darkest places of Spanish America would the greed, cruelty and licentiousness of ecclesiastics to which Sir Thomas More and Erasmus bear witness in their time be easily possible today. In other words, upon a whole side of its life the Roman Catholic Church of today is a reformed church. If it has interposed its claims to authority between Christ and the soul of the believer, it no longer contradicts those claims by the scandalous lives of popes like Borgia, whose crimes were as horrible as Nero's but upon whose gift Spain and Portugal divided the new world, or of priests who are the byword of the taverns, as they had begun to be in England in Chaucer's time. This reformation the Roman Catholic Church owes to the movement of which Luther was the mouthpiece, and some day a historian will arise in her ranks broad-minded enough to acknowledge it. In the meantime the cue of the Roman Catholic historians seems to be to cover and minimize this stage of experience and to pretend that what the church of their belief now is she has always been. And this claim is as hollow in regard to life as it is in regard to doctrine.

A disappointment which is constantly recurring is the disappointment of our own enthusiams. We put our hearts for a little while into this enjoyment or that occupation only to wake up sooner or later to the fading of an illusion, and to be forced to acknowledge that the interest to which we have given ourselves is not our life. Nothing which earth has to offer, nothing which even our best love in forming an ideal of friends can build, can permanently satisfy a human heart. To the hour of prayer we come with sorrowing hearts, unsatisfied, if this is all that life has brought us for our portion. These things which we have loved and worshiped are not our life—Christ is our life. In him alone we shall be satisfied, and in him we shall begin to be satisfied already in these very things which brought us disappointment. We shall learn the true meaning of the pursuits and pleasures which were broken cisterns, but through which the living water of his life shall flow, cleansing and making them beautiful. Christ's partnership brings prosperity to many a bankrupt pleasure and pursuit. His friendship revives and glorifies many a lapsed acquaintance. Christ is our life in little things as well as great—the things of every day as well as in the grandeurs and eternities. Autumn is disappointment, winter seems like death, but life touches the clod and it responds with waving grasses and beautiful flowers. Christ touches the heart and it looks out upon a world which is all new with a width and hight and depth undreamed of, and a beauty which transforms every dreary corner with the blossoming of spring.

PULPIT EXCHANGE WITH UNITARIANS.

The daily press has called attention to the renewal in Boston, after eighty years' disuse, of exchanges of pulpit between pastors of the Unitarian and Trinitarian branches of the original Congregational body. Dr. Herrick, Dr. Barton of the Shawmut Church and Dr. Munger of New Haven, it is announced, have arranged exchanges with Dr. Edward Everett Hale, Dr. Ames and Dr. Cuckson; and Dr. George A. Gordon and Dr. Herrick have been chosen to membership in the Boston Ministers' Association, which has been wholly Unitarian for more than two generations.

In regard to one of these exchanges the newspaper report is in error. We are authorized to state that the question of formal pulpit exchange has never even been discussed between Dr. Barton and Dr. Ames. They are close friends and near neighbors and have spoken each in the other's church at Sunday school and Thanksgiving services, but neither has invited the other to occupy his place as teacher of the congregation. In the case of Dr. Herrick and Dr. Hale, the circumstances of the proposal, as stated by Dr. Herrick in his recent twenty-fifth anniversary sermon, are interesting. They met as participants in a religious service, after a quarter of a century of friendship and of pastoral work in the same city, for the first time at a funeral recently, and the fact struck them both as so strange and unnatural that they then and there proposed and accepted an exchange for a Sunday as an expression of Christian trust and fellowship. "I will not harm his people, and I know he will do you good," said Dr. Herrick in telling the story to his own people.

With this explanation the evidence of premeditation and combination in a movement looking toward the recognition of the validity of Unitarianism vanishes. There is no concerted movement—only a coincidence of the expression of fraternal love and trust between individuals who are loved and trusted by the whole city of Boston. That cordial relations have long existed among the ministers named in the report is well known, and no one would wish to have it otherwise. They have long been associated in many undertakings on the benevolent and social side of church activity, but the doctrinal significance of the matter has been exaggerated for purposes of sensation by the newspapers. We know of no movement toward Unitarianism among our Boston ministers, nor is any one of the pastors named above open to the charge of denying the divinity of our Lord.

It is true, on the other hand, that every minister who asks or accepts an exchange does publicly indorse the minister with whom he exchanges as a trustworthy teacher of Christianity for his own people. In view of the precedent established this will seem to many a very grave responsibility. They will fear that it is a letting out of waters which it may be difficult to control. It is not true, however, as the papers which have commented upon this exchange of pulpits have implied, that there has been a total interruption of co operative relations between the Unitarian and Trinitarian ministers of Boston for eighty years. We publish in another column an appeal in behalf of the charitable fund of the Massachusetts Convention of Congregational Ministers, signed by men of both denominations, for a benevolence in support of which both have been associated from the beginning.

METHODIST AND PRESBYTERIAN COURTS.

May will bring with it two important ecclesiastical gatherings, the General Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church at Cleveland, May 1, and the General Assembly of the Presbyterians, which is appointed to meet in Saratoga on the 21st. The General Conference meets once in four years and sits for a month; the General Assembly convenes annually and usually concludes its business in eleven or twelve days.

The question of most general interest before the Methodist body is that of the admission of women as lay delegates, which seems to have been already decided in favor of admission in the lower bodies by more than the constitutional majority of three-fourths. The history of the movement is interesting. In its theory of government the Methodist Church is one of the least democratic of all the Christian bodies, having been modeled upon the societies which John Wesley founded and governed. In the American church it was only in 1872 that laymen were admitted to the General Conference, and their appointment is still by the pastor in charge of a church to the lower conference, and by that in turn to the higher. Of representation by the direct vote of the people there is even yet no trace. In 1888 a few women were appointed as lay delegates on the special ground that there was no direct constitutional prohibition, the question of sex not being raised by the wording of the amendment of 1872. The General Conference of 1888 interpreted the clause in question adversely to this claim and the women were excluded. There have been two amendments pending, originating in the two opposing camps, one expressly limiting lay representation to males and the other expressly opening it to females, and the latter, as we have said, has received up to this time more than the constitutional majority of votes in the lower conferences.

Another question, also embodied in an amendment, is that of the size and expense of the General Conference, for which a tax of $80,000, must be levied on the churches. It is proposed to limit the membership of the body—a move which involves diminishing its representative quality; and one thoughtful layman, writing in the Christian Advocate, proposes instead that the conference shall be made a decennial body, and another that the provincial system with a unifying supreme council of bishops and laymen be adopted.

In addition to these questions of organization and representation, the matter of the extension or abrogation of the time limit is sure to be brought up for discussion, though the way seems hardly clear for final action.

The General Assembly seems likely to meet with a docket comparatively free from contentious questions of doctrine. The differences of opinion have not abated, and the dissenters have not withdrawn, but there has been no case of heresy to carry up, and the fire of controversy seems to have died down for lack of fuel.

Last year's assembly aimed a parting blow at Union Seminary, enjoining the Presbytery of New York not to confer licensure on candidates studying in seminaries "respecting whose teaching the General Assembly disavows responsibility." It was felt that in this action the assembly had exceeded its authority, and now the presbytery has licensed a student from a seminary (Yale) not under the assembly's control, after full debate, and has expressly asserted its responsibility and independence in passing upon the qualifications of students under its care.

Questions of administration are likely, however, to be troublesome. For many years there has been a certain amount of latent dissatisfaction with the methods of the Board of Home Missions, partly owing to the brusque manners of one of the secretaries, not now in the service of the board, and partly to the distance of the administrative body from the active scene of the work. Presbyteries asked for more money than the board was willing to allow them and sometimes appropriations were cut down in a way which, however necessary it may have been in view of the needs of the whole field, seemed harsh to the applicants. This dissatisfaction found expression in part in the feeling that each synod ought to be responsible for its own work first, and an efficient organization of synodical sustentation was set up in New Jersey and New York in cordial relation and consultation with the board. In the West, however, in Indiana and Illinois, the same work of self-support has been undertaken, to the great increase of missionary enthusiasm and contribution but without any regard to the authority or machinery of the board. The money is collected and distributed and the work administered by the agents of the synods and only the surplus has been sent to the board for work elsewhere. If the assembly approves this method it will break up the unity and centralization of authority in the home missionary work of the church, and already the debate in the West is active in presbytery meetings and the local papers and in private conferences, although the denominational newspapers have up to this time ignored it or refused to take a decisive stand.

In addition to this, questions of the expense of the assembly and of the expediency of its frequent meetings and great size, similar to those already referred to among the Methodists, survive from last year's assembly, and will be heard from because the assembly's membership is democratic and the assessment for travel and entertainment is particularly onerous for the country churches. The Million Dollar Fund is thus far a failure, not half the sum proposed having been raised, and the debts of the boards still threaten.

Out of all these dangers and difficulties of administration the way may clear itself, as it has often done before, but there would be room for anxiety if it were not for the assurance of faith which sustains the leaders of the church.

REAL CHRISTIAN UNITY.

It does not involve organic unity. The endeavors to bring this to pass are destined to fail. No branch of the Christian Church ever existed long, unless very small or cemented by the pressure of outside hostility, which has not been divided into schools or parties, not necessarily mutually hostile, but taking different views of truth. This is not due to any defect in Christianity but only to the inherent fact that men do not all think alike. If organic unity could be once attained it would not continue a year.

The only true Christian unity is that of the spirit and purpose. If this be conceded there is nothing to hinder Christians of different denominations from mutual respect and love, or from co-operation in many lines of effort. We can unite with those who differ from us by recognizing their honesty to be equal to our own, by disregarding as much as possible in our relations with them the points of difference between us, and by emphasizing those things as to which we are at one. Many departments of Christian effort demand co operation and afford no necessary or proper opportunity for denominational controversies, and many more, doubtless, will be suggested in time.

Sectarianism is hateful and is to be avoided sedulously. Denominationalism is right and useful. It is zealous loyalty to and activity in behalf of one's own branch of Christ's church. But it puts the church in the highest and foremost place and readily concedes the denomination to be only secondary, a useful and necessary agency, but not the only, or even the chief, one. Sectarianism puts one's denomination above the church, and rather regards the church as existing for the sake of the denomination than the latter for that of the former. It looks at all subjects merely from the narrow point of view of supposed denominational interests instead of preferring these of the cause of Christ as a whole.

True Christian unity is coming to be understood better than hitherto and to be sought for more wisely and earnestly. When once it has been realized fully in practice Christians will wonder penitently why it took them so long to interpret aright our Lord's meaning when he prayed that his children all might be one.

CURRENT HISTORY.

Patriots' Day.

The commonwealth of Massachusetts realizes with increased certainty that she did well when she abolished Fast Day and substituted Patriots' Day as the spring holiday, for that was what Fast Day had come to be. Now positive, inspiring teaching takes the place of negative criticism in our pulpits. Now the inspiring memories of Lexington and Concord serve as texts for countless addresses before schools, churches and patriotic societies, which tend to purify present day politics and elevate civic ideals. The day naturally serves as a landmark around which the commonwealth or the city or the town can cluster memorial services for the worthy dead, and this year advantage was taken of this fact to commemorate worthily the service rendered to humanity by two of the recent governors of the commonwealth, Frederick T. Greenhalge and George D. Robinson. The scene in Mechanics Hall on the 18th, when Senator Lodge, surrounded by representative citizens of Massachusetts and New England to the number of 4,000, described the career and analyzed the character of Mr. Greenhalge, was most inspiring, testifying to the fact that a noble life still wins the homage of men; and when, on the following day, the same orator, standing in the Hancock Congregational Church, Lexington, set forth the virtues of the Lexington boy, who in these latter days exemplified the virtues of New England Puritanism, those who heard him rejoiced that the orator could say of his former fellow-public servant that his life proved that:

> The old qualities are all there, the old fighting qualities, and ever with them the mastering sense of duty to God, to country, and to family. They have not weakened in the centuries that have come and gone. They have broadened, but they have not pined or faded. They have not been refined and cultivated to nothingness, and when you strike down and call upon the yeomanry of Massachusetts, you find a man like this to stand forward when the State needs him.

It is a blessed fact that in so many of the addresses given last Sunday and Monday the difference between "jingoism" and patriotism was so clearly set forth, and not a few speakers improved the opportunity to plead for arbitration, and some for a federation of all English-speaking peoples, among whom, as Senator Lodge said in his eulogy of Governor Greenhalge: "The differences are superficial, the identities profound."

An Uprising Against Vandals.

It is a blot upon the fair fame of the commonwealth of Massachusetts that it should have become necessary for lovers of the historic and beautiful without her bounds to interfere in the settlement of a question that concerns her most. And yet no one can help rejoicing that the Fine Art Federation of New York and the leading architects of the country have filed their protest against the destruction of the Bulfinch front of the State House, and come to the assistance of those in the State who are battling so zealously to defeat the evident intent of the legislature. Fortunately, organizations that carry much weight with men who need votes are aroused. The State Board of Trade and members of Granges throughout the State have declared their opposition, and the Sons and Daughters of the American Revolution have given new proof of their utility by the energy with which they have entered into the campaign for the defense of the present State House. As we go to press a stirring meeting is being held in Faneuil Hall under the auspices of the Daughters of the American Revolution. The State is aroused, and it is doubtful whether the vandals will win.

The World of Domestic Politics.

Local elections in New Jersey have recorded Democratic gains, chiefly owing to dissatisfaction with the Republican reform administrations. More and more it is becoming apparent that the conventions at St. Louis and Chicago will be unusually full of strife, and likely to lead to disaffection and "bolts," whatever the platforms adopted or whoever the candidates may be. The Democratic conventions of Alabama and Missouri have declared in favor of free coinage of silver, and the delegates from Missouri will go to the National Convention prepared to bolt anything but a free coinage platform, and instructed to support the candidacy of Mr. Bland. Massachusetts Democrats, if their platform of last year indicates their position, and the utterances of their leaders indicate that it does, will indorse the gold standard quite as unequivocally as did the Republican conventions in Maine and New Jersey last week, and if ex-Gov. William E. Russell, whose candidacy is now formally announced, is indorsed by the Massachusetts Democratic Convention, as seems probable now, the situation when the delegates reach Chicago can be best imagined by those who compare the past utterances of Mr. Bland and Mr. Russell and the platforms of Missouri and Massachusetts.

President Cleveland is using all the resources of the Administration to secure a victory for the wing of the party which might fairly be represented either by the nomination of Mr. Olney, ex-Governor Russell or ex-Secretary of the Navy Whitney, and so eagerly does the Administration wish for such a victory that Secretary Carlisle and Comptroller Eckles are away from Washington expounding the Administration's views on finance to large audiences in the cities of the Interior.

The platforms adopted by the Republican Conventions of Maine, New Jersey, Nebraska and North Dakota last week, in so far as they dealt with the question of monetary standards, were far less equivocal than those of the party in Ohio and New Hampshire, and will encourage those who are expecting a clear-cut deliverance on this subject at St. Louis, though it is frankly conceded that the indorsement by the St. Louis Convention of such a platform as Mr. Reed drafted for the Maine Convention would probably cause the defection of several Western silver producing States, and the nomination of Senator Cameron of Pennsylvania on a high protection and free silver platform. It is asserted that Mr. McKinley has failed to secure the indorsement of the advisory committee of the American Protective Association, which has carefully investigated the records of all the leading Republican candidates and found Mr. McKinley's record as governor of Ohio wanting in sufficient hostility to the foe which the A. P. A. lives to combat. Kentucky Republicans will present the name of Governor Bradley as a candidate at the St. Louis Convention and the New Jersey Republicans have indorsed Hon. G. A. Hobart as their candidate for vice-president.

NOTES.

Korea is seeking an $8,000,000 loan from Russia, and pledges a province as a security.

The Spanish authorities in Cuba have arrested and imprisoned Rev. A. J. Diaz, superintendent of the Southern Baptist Mission in Cuba. Our Department of State has intervened.

The Hawaiian legislature is considering a registration act which will enable the government better to identify and control the ever-increasing number of Asiatic laborers in that country.

Vermont's "Grand Old Man," Senator Morrill, celebrated his eighty-sixth birthday last week. He is as loyal to his duties as a public servant as ever, and is one of the few survivors of a type of senator of which there are now altogether too few.

If New Mexico and Arizona enter the Union for reasons that cannot bear the glare of publicity, if the sudden change of attitude of legislators is to be explained by pressure brought to bear by political bosses, the people of the nation will have a new reason to distrust the party which they represent and another cause for hating bosses.

The breach between President Roosevelt, Messrs. Andrews and Grant of the Board of Police Commissioners of New York city and their colleague, Mr. Parker, is most lamentable. It brings the reform administration into uncalled for and undeserved disrepute, it disheartens those who had hoped that a new era had dawned and it gives indescribable pleasure to machine politicians, whether Tammany or otherwise.

The Senate has ratified the treaty which the State Department and the British Foreign Office have drafted, a treaty made necessary by the verdict of the Bering Sea Arbitration Tribunal and under which our payment of obligations for damages through illegal seizures will be determined and the awards become binding. There was a time when it seemed as if the Senate was to bring our national good name into disrepute by its refusal to obey the decree of the tribunal before which we induced Great Britain to bring and rest her case.

The value of the rain is never more evident than in the April days of sunshine when the moisture dries out of the soil and the woods are burning. From Cape Cod and from New Hampshire and New Jersey came last week the usual reports of forests burning and homesteads or even villages in danger. To the disheartened people, weary with their hopeless struggle with the creeping flame, hope comes with the gift of God when the clouds pour down their treasures. Almost every forest fire may be traced to man's criminal carelessness, and every sufferer thinks at once of aid which only God can give.

In addition to burdens of taxation Italy has just imposed upon her subjects another thing grievous to be borne, namely, dread of conscription and deportation to Africa, there to fight against the brave warriors of King Menelek of Abyssinia. Hence the arrival on our shores of 16,000 Italians during the past three months, and the prospect of the descent of 15,000 more within the next month or two, unless our immigration commissioners execute the law most literally and rigorously, which, fortunately, they seem disposed to do. Such a fact adds strength to the cause for which the Immigration Restriction League stands, and wins friends for the restrictive bills now before the national legislature.

Hon. Nelson Dingley, Jr., moderator of the National Council, has just been renominated for Congress by the Maine constituents whom he has served so long. It is because the people of Maine adopt this sane policy of continuing men in Congress when they are found efficient that the State holds its present preeminent position in the national councils. Speaker Reed has drawn a word portrait of Mr. Dingley recently that is being quoted freely. He says: "Dingley never did anything that was not useful in all his life. When he lay in the cradle he was thinking out problems in Euclid, and when he was a boy he found more pleasure in studying his lessons than he did in play."

Senator Platt of Connecticut has introduced a bill which, if Congress approves, will deal a deathblow to gambling. Step by step the nation and the States have made it illegal, but by using the telegraph, telephone and other such devices gamblers have practically nullified the law. Senator Platt's bill makes the transmission or reception by telegraph, telephone, mail, express or otherwise of any record or result of any lottery drawing or scheme, or of any bet, or the odds quoted on any race or prize fight, a misdemeanor, punishable on the first offense with imprisonment for not more than two years or by a fine of not more than $1,000 or both, and on the second and after offenses by imprisonment only. Congress will do well to clinch this nail in the coffin of gambling.

The United States minister to China, Mr. Denby, has just sent to all our consuls there the following important letter:

Legation of the United States, Peking.

To the Consuls of the United States: I have the honor to inform you that his Excellency, M. A. Gerard, minister of France, has recently procured from the Tsungili Yamen, by virtue of the French treaty of 1858, an order directing the local authorities in all provinces of the empire to expunge from the various editions and compilations of the Chinese code all clauses placing restrictions upon the propagation of the Christian religion. You are directed to bring this circular to the attention of the American missions in your consular districts. It gives me pleasure to add that the minister of France is entitled to the gratitude of the Christian world for his action on this important matter.

IN BRIEF.

A gratifying news item from the South is the statement that in hundreds of churches in North Carolina the preachers are denouncing lynching and mob law.

Western Massachusetts is to be congratulated upon the gifts to Springfield and North Adams chronicled in our Literary Notes. Both are the unsolicited gifts of wealth and culture to the needs of the community at large and both are witness that the spirit of selfishness, which is so unhappily prevalent among us, is not so all-pervasive as it seems.

The meeting of the Society of Medical Jurisprudence in New York city last week was notable for two reasons—women were admitted to membership, and an affirmative was given to the question, Shall We Save the Sickly? by the essayist of the evening, who held that "Whatever may be the effect upon the future of the race we cannot afford to disobey the moral natures we have cultivated. We had better bequeath to our descendants a deformed body rather than a distorted soul."

The directors of the American Congregational Association and the tenants of the Congregational House, Boston, met last week to confer respecting some of the important details of a new Congregational House. It will be gratifying, both to those who occupy the present building and those in the denomination who have felt for some time that denominational self-respect demanded a new and better building, to know that the outlook for a satisfactory solution of the by no means simple problem which the directors have had to face is bright.

A Presbyterian woman of California recently willed $10,000 to the church of her place of residence, the interest to be used in supplementing the salary of the pastor—provided no clergyman in charge of the church is ever installed. This is certainly an unfortunate way of looking at the matter, and shows how far we have drifted from the lifelong settlements of our forefathers. Nevertheless, we venture to predict, the church in question, if it can secure the right sort of a supply, will keep him as long as it can and there will be recognition, if not installation.

Having just observed Patriots' Day, and with Memorial Day and Fourth of July not many weeks distant, it seems a fitting time to stimulate patriotism in our younger readers by printing a series of short biographical sketches on American patriots. The names of Webster, Lincoln and others are household words, but the inspiring story of their lives needs to be told afresh to each rising generation. Miss Grant, teacher and author, will accordingly gather the boys and girls around her in the Home for this purpose, beginning this week with the boyhood of the immortal Franklin.

The Golden Rule contrasts the unfortunate division in the ranks of the Salvation Army with the unity of the Christian Endeavor movement to the advantage of the latter in its absence of a central authority. The same contrast might be made in favor of the Congregational system of church government, but it must always be remembered that great enterprises demand the centralization of responsibility and that we are the more bound by our independence to emphasize our fellowship and support our recognized agencies of co-operative work. The absence of authority is a special call to an increase of good will.

Mr. William Lloyd Garrison, speaking before the Boston Reform Club on the restriction of immigration, paid a genuine but left-handed compliment to theological students in defending the Italians of Boston from the charge of quarrelsomeness. "An official, prominent in the reformatory influences among them, expressed to me his belief that there would be more fighting in the crowded hives they swarm in should their present occupants be replaced by theological students." Theological students ought to be proud to be selected as the most shining examples of a peaceful life—always excepting the Italian immigrants of Boston.

We alluded last week to the "enterprise" of the "great newspapers" which spread before the public the memoirs of a convicted and sentenced murderer. It seems that they stimulated him to add the sin of falsehood to all the others of which he confessed himself guilty, several of his alleged victims having turned up alive. Perhaps, however, he had been accustomed to read the newspapers which tempted him, and thought lying was a necessary part of the consideration involved in his literary bargain. With a lack of gallantry quite out of character The Pilot suggests that his "confession" will probably "induce an army of female and other fools to petition for his pardon."

The essential likeness between the polities of the Congregational and Baptist churches quite naturally caused our Baptist brethren to be interested in the outcome of the recent council at Madison, Ct., and we are not surprised to find the Standard citing the case as an admirable illustration of the superiority of the Congregational or independent system of church government. It contrasts this "striking action with others in the recent past, where the whole ground of Biblical criticism and doctrinal theology has been gone over to the minutest detail, in a spirit too often marred by unkind and un-Christian feeling." It describes the document in which the council expressed its opinion as one of "unusual good sense."

The Men's Sunday Evening Club of the United Church, New Haven, has just closed a most notable series of lectures given on Sunday evenings since last October by such men as George W. Cable, Andrew D. White, G. Stanley Hall, Booker T. Washington, Bishop Vincent, Professors George Harris, Charles A. Briggs, E. L. Curtis and W. N. Rice, President Hyde of Bowdoin College and clergymen like Drs. Moxom and McKenzie. Each lecture has been of a distinctively religious and ethical character and helpful in cultivating the minds and hearts of those who have heard it, and the course has solved the Sunday evening problem for that church. The example is worthy of imitation where like circumstances prevail.

The trustees of the Maine Wesleyan Seminary and Female College at Kents Hill recently elected a prominent brewer of Portsmouth, N. H., as member of the board of trustees. Last week the Maine Methodist Episcopal Conference expressed its opinion that "this action of the trustees compromised not only the seminary, but also our common Methodism, subjecting us not only to unfavorable criticism, but also to a painful humiliation." The brewer says that he will not withdraw from the position because the conference has acted thus, but it is hardly probable that he will have an opportunity to serve. The institution would scarcely dare ignore the opinion of the conference, and the conference could scarcely have done less, whether acting from principle or policy.

Changes in the teaching staffs of our seminaries are being made preparatory to the work of next year. Our Chicago correspondent chronicles the changes there. Hartford recently made Professor Gillett full professor of apologetics, and now comes the news from Andover that Prof. John Wesley Churchill, now professor of elocution and lecturer on literature, has been elected by the trustees Bartlet professor of sacred rhetoric and lecturer on pastoral theology. Professor Churchill's experience, gained in executing so successfully the duties of his present post, has given him exceptionally adequate preparation for the work which the trustees have called upon him to assume, a far better preparation than one called from a pastorate could have brought.

Many people will be inclined to say that the argument of Rev. C. H. Hamlin, published in another column, on the subject of Bicycles versus Sunday, pushed to its logical conclusion would lead to the abandonment of all attempts to hedge in the weekly rest by custom or legislation. It may be well, therefore, to remember that our laws cannot extend further than the establishment of a common time of rest and the protection of worship from molestation and annoyance. Fathers may establish a positive law of Sunday observance for their children and churches for their members, but to win members to the churches they must be persuaded and not coerced. We may regret that temptations multiply, but we can only offset them by making Christianity more convincing and attractive. And belief in the capabilities and attractions of our common faith will lead to views as cheerfully optimistic as those of Mr. Hamlin.

One great difficulty which half-awakened minds have in getting the most that is possible from the Bible is the lack of historical perspective. They understand the fact that space is wide, that it is a long distance from New York to Chicago, for example, but of the extent of time they have little idea. An article in The Sunday School Times records an amusing instance of this which, however incredible it may appear to our readers, might easily be duplicated among the ignorant. In answer to a letter inclosing some publication on the evidences of Christianity sent him by his sister, the man replied:

My dear sister, don't worry about me. I'm all right. I have gotten rid of all my old superstitions, and never want them back. I was never so happy in all my life. The trouble with your friend the rector, as well as with the author of the book that you sent me, is that both assume the truth of the Bible; but we all know that it is full of inaccuracies and falsehoods. For example, in one of the Gospels we are told that Joseph was the husband of Mary, while we are carefully informed elsewhere that he married the daughter of Potiphera, the priest of On. I don't want to pin my faith to any of the statements of such a book.

FROM BOSTON.

The South Union Station.

Bostonians seem to have been seized with a mania for mammoth new building enterprises, regardless of labor, cost and sacrifice of existing structures, and the local papers contain each week plans and pictures of projected new blocks which the year 1897 is likely to see. In the legislature the burning topic of the hour and the subject now uppermost in the minds of business men is the proposed new union station for the four roads entering Boston on the south. Mayor Quincy himself is responsible for the bill granting a charter to the Terminal Co. to build at the foot of Summer Street, and the scheme has had the backing of leading railroad men and prominent Boston merchants, but it has also been subjected to severe criticism on the ground that it involves the taking by the city of one-fifth of our wharf frontage and the destruction of much taxable property, that it will be an obstacle to easy travel between South Boston Flats and the business section, and on account of the enormous expense to the city of street widenings and extensions.

Other New Buildings.

Already the work of destruction has begun on the block at the corner of Boylston and Tremont Street, opposite the Masonic Temple, to make way for Mr. J. R. Whipple's immense new ten-story hotel which, according to the terms of the contract, should be completed by Sept. 1, 1897. The style of architecture chosen for Hotel Touraine, as it is to be called, is French, of the time of Louis XII. A striking feature of the plans is the absence of billiard and private supper rooms. The new Tremont Building is likely to have a rival in a huge eleven-story office building to be erected by a syndicate on Tremont Row and Pemberton Square. Plans for restoring the Pope Bicycle Building, which was damaged by fire last month, are being considered and the preparatory work has commenced, but it will be months before its old beauty is restored. Business enterprises, however, have not the monopoly of new buildings. The Massachusetts Historical Society is planning a new home on a site which it already owns on the corner of the Fenway and Boylston Street; the Massachusetts Charitable Eye and Ear Infirmary, which treated last year no less than 80,000 patients, has applied to the legislature for aid in securing a new building which it sorely needs. There are whispers even of a new Congregational House and the hopes raised at a recent meeting of directors and the tenants of the present building have made its discomforts more endurable.

Increased Library Facilities.

It has been a little more than a year since the library was opened to the public. According to the reports of the trustees and of Librarian Putnam, recently issued, the whole number of volumes now is 628,297, of which 30,611 have been added to the collection during the past year, more than 15,000 being gifts from friends of the institution. There has been a great increase in the number of persons holding registration cards during the twelve months, as well as in the number of readers. In the old library not more than 200 persons were accommodated in the reading-rooms at one time while in the new building the number of readers commonly exceeds 600 or 700. The periodical and children's rooms are already overcrowded. One of the new arrangements by which the treasures of the library are made more accessible to the public is that which permits visitors freely to take down and use without the intervention of an attendant about 15,000 volumes. In the old library one could have direct access to only about 300 reference books in Bates Hall besides those in the Patent Library.

Possible Changes in Boston Pulpits.

Clarendon Street Church has extended a unanimous call to Rev. Dr. I. N. Halderman of the First Baptist Church, New York, but the outcome is not yet known. He is a scholarly man, about fifty years old, who is a graduate of Crozier Theological School in Chester, Pa., and has held important pastorates in Wilmington, Del., and in New York city. He has occupied his present pulpit for more than a decade. Dr. Halderman is said to be proficient in Hebrew and New Testament Greek and Bible literature, and his preaching, which is always extemporaneous, is of a high order.

A call to the presidency of Buchtel College, Akron, O., has come to Dr. G. L. Perin who, as pastor of the Every Day Church, has for two years thrown himself heart and soul into successful work along institutional lines at the South End. The new position offered him possesses many attractions, but it is to be hoped that Boston Universalists will not lose so earnest and aggressive a man. ☞

FROM NEW YORK.

The Tabernacle and Dr. Stimson.

Another step in the Broadway Tabernacle's action on Dr. Stimson's resignation was taken on Wednesday evening, April 15, at an adjourned meeting of the church, followed immediately by a called meeting of the society. Both meetings were largely attended and in both the kindest feeling was manifested. The church appointed a committee of six—Deacons Thomson and Houghton, with Messrs. Clarence A. Bowen, M. C. D. Borden, I. R. Fisher and the church clerk, W. I. Washburn—empowered, in conference with Dr. Stimson, to arrange all needful plans for the calling of a council with reference to the resignation. The society voted that the above named committee represent it as well as the church in all matters pertaining to the council. It also formally authorized the payment by the trustees of one year's salary to the retiring pastor, as was proposed at the church meeting of the previous week. Every word spoken on the occasion was in the most conciliatory spirit, and this meeting, like the former, was "an object lesson in the beneficent working of Congregational principles."

It is a pleasant fact that one hears not an unkind word concerning Dr. Stimson even from those who differ most widely from his ideas as to the management of this particular church, as announced in the pulpit some months ago and then given in The Congregationalist and elsewhere. The chief point of difference has been upon the question whether his favorite plan of church work, so well adapted to certain parts of the city, is the best for this old "family church," in its location, with its costly plant, but necessarily restricted room. There was, evidently, a misunderstanding of the doctor's position and plans by those who visited him in St. Louis before the call, plainly as he thought he stated the case. And this has been at the root of the difficulty ever since.

An Irreparable Loss.

Not only the Broadway Tabernacle Church, but—as Dr. Stimson justly said in his announcement—the city, the State and the whole nation has met with an irreparable loss in the death of Austin Abbott, Esq., who left us on Sunday morning, April 19. He has been, since 1871, a member and for much of the time a beloved deacon of the Tabernacle Church. Long known as one of the most learned "book lawyers" of the New York bar, and later as Dean of the New York University Law School, his influence has been widespread and always on the side of religion as well as of justice. His sterling integrity none ever doubted. Many young men all over the land will hold him in lifelong remembrance as the friend who gave the decisive upward spiritual bent to their lives while preparing them for legitimately earned success in their profession. So is narrowing down the circle of that notable family of the late Jacob Abbott, to which the Christian world owes an immense debt of gratitude.

The Volunteers.

There are few busier places in the city just now than are the headquarters of "the Volunteers," on the sixth floor of the Bible House. One needs to look in upon it but five or ten minutes to learn at least one secret of the Ballington Booths' past success and to gain strong assurance of the prosperity of the new enterprise. Both the "commander" (now wearing the four-star shoulder straps of an American general) and his wife, whose office adjoins his, have in large measure the faculty for business. Not all the executive offices being filled as yet, nearly everything has to come for decision directly before the supreme authority, and it is interesting to see the speed with which reports from all departments on all sorts of business are received and dispatched, orders given, telegrams dictated and questions answered—all without a moment's "rattling," irritation or lack of polite attention to a friendly caller. As the facts come out, especially since the commander's full setting forth of the steps that led to the new organization, the Volunteers are growing in public favor, and none could be more sanguine than are Ballington Booth and his wife. Their changed relations to the churches is winning the Volunteers already hosts of friends. The first number of The Volunteers' Gazette is in a higher style of contents and execution than the War Cry, and steps are already taken to improve it in both respects. The orders just received from General Booth that the Salvation Army officers here publish the correspondence leading to the disruption will doubtless lengthen the controversy, but it will not be long before this sort of talk will give place to the earnest work on which the heart of the commander and his Volunteers are set.

The Same Old Story.

Consolidation and the Raines excise law are still trying the faith and patience of the saints here. The great difficulty still is to know "where we are at" in relation to either of them. The mayors of New York and Brooklyn, after protracted hearings, both "vetoed" the Greater New York law, in the form in which it was passed, and Pat. Gleason of Long Island City, as a matter of course, went for it and the Tammany pickings and stealings involved in it. There will be an attempt to "jam" the act again through the legislature in time to cut off a new and juster bill now before the assembly which would be vastly more acceptable to the cities concerned.

Much disgust and some wrath has been roused by the action of the Governor and excise commissioner in appointing the excise officials not subject to civil service rules—thus making them political tools, sure to defeat the best features of the law, if they do not make it wholly inoperative.

More Ministers.

After careful examination by the Manhattan Association at its spring meeting with the Lee Avenue Church, Brooklyn, five seniors in Union Theological Seminary were approved to preach the gospel—presumably in Congregational pulpits.

HUNTINGTON.

FROM THE INTERIOR.

Ministers' Meeting.

Rev. W. E. McClennan, a Methodist brother, had been invited to set before us the results of his investigations into the spiritual needs of the city. He is intensely in earnest and is a man of varied experience both in the foreign and home missionary field. He does not deal in extravagant language nor in denunciation. He tries to point out facts and leaves them to make their appeal. In Chicago, as in other cities, the tendency of the churches to abandon certain down-town districts was made very clear. It was not made quite so clear how this tendency is to be met and averted, or how the gospel is to be given to Roman Catholics and the foreign born citizens who make up so large a portion of the population in these neglected wards. It is certain they cannot be brought into our Protestant churches even if the wards are supplied with them. Rome has not overlooked the wants of her children or failed, except in a very few instances, to provide for them. Mr. McClennan expressed his faith in the social settlement, and his conviction that foreign missionary methods must be employed in these home fields. He lays little stress on preaching, a great deal on example and personal association. The subsequent attack on the policy of the City Missionary Society seemed to overlook the fact that while the society has sought to establish self-supporting churches in the hope of securing means for pure mission work in the slums, it has always set aside far more than half its yearly income to work in localities where there can be no hope of self-support. Still it is by no means certain that it cannot improve or change its policy in certain directions. At any rate its directors have secured the meeting of the Congregational Club next Monday night for the discussion of their work, and will gladly listen to any suggestions which promise speedy and sure evangelization of the city. Our churches are not indifferent to the so-called neglected classes. Their leaders want to know in what way they may best minister to them. They are not all satisfied that it is through the social settlement.

Ingersoll and the Church Militant.

Last Sunday morning, true to his promise, Colonel Ingersoll appeared on the platform with Rev. Mr. Rusk, the pastor of the church which has hitherto worshiped in Willard Hall. Services last Sunday were in Columbia Theater, and will be there in the future. The opening exercises were as usual and when the Colonel came to speak he evidently felt under restraint, for his words were courteous, even considerate, toward the church and her work. His discourse was upon ignorance as the cause of all the burdens and limitations from which we are suffering, and was epitomized in the phrase: "There is no darkness but ignorance. Let us flood the world with intellectual light." Of course he denied that man can have any trustworthy idea of the supernatural, but he affirmed it to be every one's duty to do all possible good while on the earth.

Interest on the part of Congregational circles has this week centered on the theological seminary. The closing exercises began with the annual sermon Sunday evening in Union Park Church before the graduating class. The preacher was Rev. J. W. Strong, D. D., president of Carleton College. His text was Col. 2: 8: "Beware lest any man spoil you through philosophy and vain deceit, after the tradition of men, after the rudiments of the world and not after Christ." The sermon was full of thought, worthy of the occasion and impressive. The Alumni Institute was in session Tuesday, Rev. W. A. Waterman presiding. Papers on the Weakness of Modern Preaching, which was found in the fact that so few seem to have had a vision of God, and on Dr. Gordon's Argument from the Consciousness of Jesus, by Prof. W. D. Mackenzie occupied the morning hours. While this latter paper was eminently fair, it was a keen criticism of the positions taken by Dr. Gordon in connection with the use of the phrase—"consciousness of Christ." Though finding a great deal in Dr. Gordon to admire and with which to agree, Professor Mackenzie pointed out the weak points in the brilliant preacher's arguments, and showed how again and again he seems to have come up to his opportunity only to turn away from it. It is rare that a paper gives more real satisfaction than this of Dr. Mackenzie. Not a few felt that if the author of the book and the reviewer could meet and discuss the questions at issue great good might result. Few books have had a wider reading in the West than this by the minister of the New Old South, and few are more worthy of being read and pondered. All the more valuable, therefore, is a criticism of some of its positions by one so competent as Professor Mackenzie. Carefully prepared papers were read in the afternoon on The Minister in His Study, in His Parish and as Preacher of Righteousness.

But the address which was felt to be most valuable and which made the deepest impression was that given by Dr. E. P. Goodwin of the First Church on the Office of the Holy Spirit. In the evening the inaugural address of Rev. Carl Augustus Paeth, as professor of theology in the German department of the seminary, was delivered in the audience-room of the Bethany Church. It was on the Mission of Congregationalism Among the Germans. Professor Paeth believes that Congregationalism has a mission, and is doing not a little through his writings, his sermons and his instruction to show his countrymen what this mission is.

Graduating Exercises.

These were in the First Church and took place Wednesday evening. Fifty-five young men have this year gone out from all the departments of the seminary. Twenty-one completed the B. D. course, the others the diploma course, or the course which has grown out of the short course introduced into the seminary soon after the war. This is a course which does not insist on previous training in college, although something like an equivalent for it is now demanded. During the year there have been 167 students in attendance upon the lectures, 113 of them English speaking. The others have been taught in German, Dano-Norwegian and Swedish. Thirteen graduated from the Swedish department, one from the German and three from the Dano Norwegian. Herbert W. Gates, a fellow of last year, has been appointed librarian, and the fellowship of this year has been awarded Horace Leslie Strain of Galesburg, with Edward Bascom Cushing as alternate. Hereafter Professor Taylor will give instruction in pastoral theology, as well as in sociology, while Professor Willcox, to whose department it has hitherto belonged, will lecture on Congregationalism and special studies. Great satisfaction has been expressed both by students and faculty with the work of Professor Mackenzie. Eight of the young men are to enter the foreign field, two of them from the Swedish department.

A Bust of President Fisk.

One of the most interesting and touching incidents of the closing days of the term was the unveiling in Fisk Hall, Wednesday afternoon, of a bust of the still vigorous yet venerable president of the institution. It is the work of Lorado Taft, Esq., an artist of wide fame, and is worthy the distinguished man it commemorates. It is in the finest of Carrara marble. The exercises were conducted by Dr. G. S. F. Savage, who was one of the trustees who, more than forty years ago, invited Dr. Fisk to his professorship of rhetoric in Beloit College, as well as of the seminary, which afterwards called him to the chair of homiletics, which for thirty-seven years he has filled with so much satisfaction to the friends of the seminary everywhere. His words of reminiscence, far from fulsome, were tender, appreciative and touching. Professor Curtiss spoke for the faculty, Rev. W. A. Waterman for the alumni, and Mr. E. B. Cushing of the graduating class for the students. President Fisk made an appropriate reply to the words of felicitation to which he had listened, and referred feelingly to his long connection with the seminary, to those with whom he had been associated as instructors and directors, to the alumni now scattered over the world, and expressed his confidence in the future of the seminary, whose growth he believes will be as rapid as it has been during the past decade. Dr. Kedzie of Michigan led in prayer, and the benediction was pronounced by Rev. W. A. Nichols of Lake Forest, now more than fourscore, one of the friends of early and dark days, when his gift of a thousand dollars meant as much as a hundred thousand would mean now. The singing during these exercises, and in all the public exercises of the week, under the direction of Professor Chamberlain, was all that could be desired.

FROM INDIA.

iticism of the Salvation Army.

General Booth, the head of the Salvation rmy, has paid another flying visit to India. e is a man of large schemes which he irls upon the world like red-hot thunder-olts. During the present brief and dra-atic sojourn in this land he urged upon ie authorities a new "peasant settlement heme," whereby he proposes to do great ings for the submerged nine-tenths of ndia. He was afforded ample opportunity explain and advocate the scheme before ose in power and all gave kind and mpathetic ear and promised thorough nsideration, but now that the general as left our shores in search of other lands conquer admiration for him and his roposal is giving way to criticism and mpathy is cooling into indifference and ven opposition. The general has asked uch from the Indian Government, both land and money. Thousands of acres nd lacs of rupees will go far towards aterializing any benevolent enterprise for ie starving millions of India, but I shall eel much surprised if he gets anything ut honeyed words from one of the most natter of-fact governments in the world. Ie has to prove not only his broad and enerous intentions, but also the feasibility nd practicability of the scheme even to etails. Too much is left for this unpo-tic government to assume in reference to ie workability of the project, and as for etails, how can they expect so great a man furnish them! And even if he showed ie wisdom of the plan, it does not follow iat it would work unless it were under the irection of wise and experienced men. olonel Tucker, the real father of the scheme nd the only one on the army staff who has nowledge of India adequate to its work-ng has left India with his chief. More-ver, they have already a peasant scheme n western India and it is clearly shown hat this is far removed from a success. Doubtless the general has been assured of he success of that farm by his too san-uine, not to say unhistorical, subordinates.

Herein lies the weakness, not to use a tronger word, of all the work of the Sal-ation Army in India. It is and has een in the hands of men who are either nexperienced, and hence incompetent, or lse of those who are so intoxicated with eal or so possessed with an insane pas-ion for reports that their testimony is of ittle value. It is certain that if the "con-ersions" reported in this land during the ast twelve years by the army were added ogether they would reach several millions, nd yet 5,000 would be a generous limit to ive to the number of "soldiers" in India oday. And of this number it would be langerous to hazard how many were former nembers of missions in regular standing. We all admire the grand devotion and self-lenial of the army officers and wish them Godspeed in their arduous labors, but here is nothing gained and much confidence ost, both in them and also in the Christian ause at large, by reports of progress which re founded only on the imagination of their eporters.

Having studied the movement since its ncipiency in India, I am prepared to main-ain that, in proportion to the money ex-pended, efforts put forth and lives sacri-ficed, no mission in the same time has had ess success in India than the Salvation Army. And this new settlement scheme appears like a confession of failure in their direct work of converting souls and an attempt to abandon the spiritual in favor of secular work. For it must be remembered that the general has publicly committed himself to a conduct of the settlement scheme on strictly non-religious, or, at least, non-sectarian lines. The religious scruples of all the peasants will be strictly regarded and means afforded them for worshiping idols or our blessed Lord himself, according to their wish. Thus no distinction will be made between Christians and non Christians and no direct effort made to convert the latter. The movement is thus, from its incipiency, not a missionary effort but a secular philanthropy.

Comparative Security of Indian Missionaries.

To an India missionary who has just read the able and interesting report of the American Board's deputation to Japan, and who has been sickened with the details of the massacres of China and the unspeakable horrors of Turkey, there naturally arises thoughts of gratitude and sentiments of praise. He feels that his lines have fallen in pleasant places. There are some things worse for a missionary than to live under the scorching rays of a tropical sun, working for a people whose bane is apathy and whose god is custom. Better for him the docility and appreciation of a too conservative Hindu than the wild independence and distrust of a madly advancing Japanese. Better an abode on the equator, under the broad and benign rule of England, than a paradise under the misrule of the unspeakable Turk and treacherous Chinaman. A missionary should not court ease any more than he should court martyrdom. He asks only for two things to create an ideal situation for work—an appreciative people and the strong protecting hand of an impartial government. Those two he possesses to a no small degree in India. We missionaries of the Board do earnestly hope that the recommendation of the above mentioned deputation anent more deputations to mission fields may be acted upon by the Board. As a member of a mission which no officer of our Board has visited for forty years, and which therefore cannot possibly be fully understood by those in power at Boston, I desire to add my emphasis to the absolute growing need of a personal knowledge by the officers of our Board of the missions under their control.

The Student Volunteer Movement.

This is in more ways than one transmuting its holy impulses into world-wide effort for others. Under the wise and efficient direction of Mr. Mott, it has just completed an excellent campaign in India. A number of conventions were held in large centers where hundreds of English speaking Christian and non-Christian students were assembled from the surrounding districts. Hundreds of Christian young men were, through these meetings, brought into the joys of a new-found life in Christ, while large numbers of non-Christian youth pledged themselves more or less to the duties and privileges of a Christian life. We trust that this may be only the beginning of this grand work.

India's Greatest Need.

A long experience in this land leads me to the conviction that India needs not so much the efforts of a number of imported peripatetic lecturers, however distinguished they may be, as it does the burning appeals of spiritually minded and spirit bearing souls. A dozen such men could do much more good to young India than a hundred profound and eloquent lecturers. India is in danger of being intellectualized to death. What we need is more heat rather than light. I do not wish to depreciate any effort at giving to India western and Christian thought. I only desire to emphasize the supreme fact that the greatest and most urgent need of this land today is not thought but life—even the direct life of the indwelling spirit of God.

CURRENT EVENTS IN AFRICA: THEIR BEARING ON CHRISTIANITY.

BY FREDERIC PERRY NOBLE.

Three cycles of African affairs reward study from the standpoint of Christian interests. One comprises the attitude of Abyssinia to Europe. Another is the bearing of Islam in Sudan upon Christendom. The most important consists of the relations in Transvaal between the British and the Dutch. These developments have historic meaning. They express three stages in Christian evolution. Each affords grounds for believing that all will ultimately forward Christian civilization.

1. Abyssinia, though a tropic country, offers fit fields of colonization to Greeks, Portuguese, Provençals, Sicilians and Spaniards. With intelligent guidance its economic advantages and industrial capacities could be developed in manifold ways. But this great land is not large enough to contain both Ethiops and Italians.

Suppose Abyssinia continues to vindicate its independence. Italy has imbittered it against European Christianity, if not against civilization. Ethiopic Christianity, an anomalous survival from the ancient world, associates with the reactionary Russian church and resists the advance of the Latin and the Teutonic communion. The influence of Greek churchmen, so far as it affects the Abyssinian hierarchy, would militate against Roman Catholic and Lutheran missions. If the Ethiopian soldiers drive the Italians into the sea, Abyssinia will be barred against missionaries, as it was after the expulsion of the Portuguese in the seventeenth century and the Anglicans and Jesuits two generations ago. From 1868 to 1890 the country was also closed to evangelization. To effect an understanding with the Ethiopian powers will, if feasible, be difficult and tedious.

Suppose Italy conquers this land, apparently preserved for some high purpose of Providence. The Abyssinians' deep and passionate instinct of nationality and their adherence to Christianity may in some way yet be made fulcrums for missionary leverage. If Italy made her suzerainty over this African power effective, its Christian barbarians could not so speedily and thoroughly be satisfied as by engaging them in a crusade against Islam. The Ethiopic Christian has so often, and so powerfully, smitten Islam that the African Mussulman says: Not from Russia nor from any realm of Europe, but from Abyssinia shall come the conquerors of Islam, the destroyers of its holy city and temple. If Britain and Italy could pacify Abyssinia, the advance on Sudan would enjoy enhanced possibilities of success.*

*Since this sentence was written, the following cablegram has appeared: "Cairo, April 6. It is rumored the Abyssinian envoy has just left, bearing a letter from Cromer, the British minister, to the negus."

2. The Mahdist movement is one of many protests against such Christianity, largely nominal and practically idolatrous, as that of Abyssinia and Egypt. It is a modern continuance of Islam's holy war against mediæval African Christianity. It is the expiring effort of Muslim missions through the sword. It is, in spirit, hand in glove with the Armenian massacres. French and Turkish intrigues have fomented the renewal of the military and political intrigues of the Sudanese khalif against Britain in Egypt.

For the reopening of Sudan the British occupy two bases, one is Egypt, the other Belgian Kongo. Leopold's men are moving down the Nile between Lake Albert and Gondokoro, a district leased by Britain to the Belgian sovereign of Kongo. Effective occupation will result in England regaining the Negro lands of Equatoria and Gazelle River province. This part of the task is comparatively easy. Here Islam has no hold. The natives will gladly welcome any power that will save them from Mohammdan "missionaries" and slavers. Probably the Jesuits can soon resume their mission at Gondokoro.

To master Nubia, Kordo and Fur will be no child's play. The country is difficult. The Arab is a splendid soldier. Naturally a finer fighting machine than the Briton, race hatred and religious passion make him a still more formidable military force. Fortunately, however, Britain has astute and able men in Egypt, among them Cromer and Wingate. Possibly they may effect a friendly understanding with Menelek, and also pit the Senusites against the Mahdists. Could Abyssinia alone be won, Sudan would be outflanked and Britain would hold a position of superior strategic value. If the Senusites, who abhor the Mahdists as heretics, could be enlisted against them, Wadai would afford a fourth base of operations against Egyptian Sudan. Its Senusite sultan warred successfully against the late mahdi. The 300,000 soldiers of the present khalif, even if equipped with the best arms, could not withstand the forces closing upon them from Abyssinia, Egypt, Equatoria and Wadai. But even without Abyssinia and Wadai, east and west, Egypt and Equatoria, the northern and the southern jaw of the vice, will be enough for the seizure of Sudan. In 1901 Europe will have shattered Sudanese Mahdism.

It would seem as if Providence were making the American Board a residuary legatee of the American Association and pointing it to Sudan. The Board may yet withdraw from Japan. Russia and Turkey will expel it from the Osmanli realm. The association in 1881 explored between Khartûm and Sobat for the purpose of founding a mission. The Mahdi balked the intention. When Mahdist misrule ends the endeavor of American Congregationalism can be consummated.

European mastery of Equatoria and Egyptian Sudan will eventuate in Christian missions among the pagan Negroes of Nileland, the once Christian Nubians, the Gallas, some of them nominally Christian, some nominally Mohammedan, and the Furians, formerly fanatical Islamites.

3. From the Nile to the cape is it a far cry? No. Had we overheard the confidential conversation between Chamberlain and Rhodes in London last February, we should have learned that the advance was planned before Menelek crushed Baratieri. Rhodes returned to South Africa via Egypt and Zanzibar. The British relief of the Italians at Kassala is mere by-play. British Central Africa will be built up from Rhodesia and Uganda. From the south it touches Lake Tanganika, from the north Lake Albert Edward. It will acquire the western shore of the Tanganika and a link between it and the Albert Edward. It will bind the Nile with the Lualaba Lakes and the Zambezi, and make the backbone of Africa and the main lines of communication into British domains.

This is Rhodes's "political career [that] is only beginning." In it Transvaal must participate.

The Boer oligarchy, though in legality technically right in resisting foreign aggression, is in equity at fault in withstanding the spirit of the age. The rule of the Dutch African does not deserve perpetuation. During the century and a half that he held the Cape (1652–1795, 1803–1806), he effected little for civilization and less for Christianity. His treatment of the aborigines has ever been and still is an iniquity. His slave raids in Cape Colony after 1754 provoked a participant to write: "May God forgive the land!" His wars in Transvaal against the natives result in their extermination or serfage. The constitution of Transvaal, the South African republic, though forbidding slavery and slave dealing and permitting missions, will not tolerate equality between blacks and whites, established Dutch Presbyterianism as a state church, and subjects the spread of Christianity among natives to hostile provisions. The Transvaal state is based on inequality and intolerance. The tension between the Boer and the Briton, between the descendant of six generations of African Europeans and the immigrant of the past decade, is an irrepressible conflict. It is the retrograde seventeenth century and scholastic religion against our progressive century and its vital Christianity. Despite Rhodes's treatment of the colored people in Cape Colony, auguring ill for their brothers in the Dutch republics if he secured ascendancy, the ultimate effect of Anglo American dominance throughout Transvaal must make for the advancement of Christianity and civilization and for the betterment of African races.

But among the younger Dutch of South Africa are men who are restive under the reactionary repression practiced by the Boer rulers. These men desire fellowship with progressive and vital civilization. When foreign immigrants, Dutch Africans and British colonists from the Cape and Natal lock hands for the development of Africa, the stalwart yeomanry of Orange Free State and Transvaal will render splendid service in Zambezia, the lake countries and Equatoria. These sturdy peasants possess superb qualities. The men and women have strong constitutions and prolific vitality. The race is acclimated, and, judging from the happy experience of the Dutch in the East Indies, should have no difficulty in adjusting itself to tropical conditions in Africa. The people, though their spiritual life is more Judaic than Christian, have moral and religious principles. The African missions, carried on by Andrew Murray and like-minded Dutch Presbyterians in Cape Colony (to say nothing of the fact that the sons of the Transvaal Boers who destroyed Livingstone's mission are evangelizing the natives) promise Dutch missionaries in the near future. From the sons and daughters of the African Dutch of today shall come pioneers for the Christian conquest and civilization of tropical Africa.

MISSING THE PRIZE OF LIFE.*

BY REV. JOHN WATSON, M. A., D. D.

Never is one so utterly overcome by the leaden weight of monotony as in a street of the middle class. The West end stimulates the imagination by its suggestion of historical names, of art treasures, of cultured luxury. The East end horrifies the imagination by its suggestion of sanctioned crime, of fierce deeds, of sheer barbarism. One cannot see either the Borghese Palace or a Bedouin's tent without a relief from the ordinary, and a re-enforcement of romance. But to run the gauntlet of a hundred houses, where each one is the exact reproduction of all the rest, with so many windows on the first floor, so many on the second; with a door of the same hight, shape, appearance, and with the very curtains all woven from the same pattern, is a weariness of the soul. What a wilderness of the commonplace; what a miracle of sameness! Certainly, as seen from the street, but open the door and enter. In fifty-seven a young mother is holding her first-born child; in forty-two a father is bidding his children farewell before he takes the great journey; in thirty-one a son is telling his mother of his first success. Those are events charged with the joy and sorrow of life, chapters in the one lasting romance. Within the smooth, unrelieved face of brick goes on the tragedy and victory of being as surely as in the ancient time, and all the things are happening of which poets sing.

Sometimes it also appears as if the mass of people one meets were commonplace and uninteresting to the last extreme. They dress after the same fashion, they say the same things, they have the same tricks of manner; they are the slaves of the same conventions. If some one would only break away from this conformity, if he would only strike out for himself, what a color he would give to society, what a tonic he would be to jaded minds. Have those men and women no dreams, no visions, no passions, no commotions in their placid, self-contained, orderly lives? So in our moods of weariness we fret and complain of our neighbors. Why are we not more understanding and sympathetic? Have we had no experiences which we do not hand round for inspection, which we lock up in our hearts? Perhaps our neighbor has his secrets, too, and wears the thicker mask the more he dreads detection. Once he winced when conversation touched a certain kind of family sorrow; once his laugh was a little forced concerning one of life's comedies; neither husband nor wife joined in your condemnation of that social sinner. You mean?—nothing except that every one likes to have some kind of screen between him and the passers-by. You know?—nothing, absolutely nothing, except that every life has had its incidents.

It has been said that each one of us could write one romance out of his own experiences, and if that be true the subject would be love. Concerning this passion no self respecting person will say much, and he that has felt its tides at their fullest will say least; but beyond question it remains the most irresistible and effectual in human experiences. In the second part of the Holy Scripture it is hardly touched upon, because the New Testament is the history of a cause; in the former part it meets us everywhere, from the idyl of Jacob and Rachel to the lamentable tragedy of Hosea, because the Old Testament is the story of human lives. The glory of pure love is sung in the Canticles; the pollution of unchaste desire is declared in Proverbs. The romance of Isaac meeting Rebecca in the eventide, and being her true husband till death, is an eternal contrast to David's wandering passions and loathly degradation. Outside the Bible creative literature dealing with many motives has ever returned to love, and lavished its art on the analysis of this supreme passion, which, if bound with many cords, will tear itself free, and, being outraged, will pull down the very pillars of a human life.

It may not be possible so to appraise the gains of life as to array them on a scale from highest to lowest, giving to culture, happiness, wealth, power, honor, each its own fixed place, since what is fascinating to one man is indifferent to his neighbor. No one in his senses can doubt, however, that love is the chief possession within our imagination, and that its power has not failed. For its sake a man has agonized and striven with the world and his soul; for its sake a woman has welcomed hardship and isolation, and both were right. Browning never struck a deeper and truer tone than the divinity and sovereignty of love, on which he constructs some of his most captivating poems. As where the middle-aged man mourns over the body of Evelyn Hope, whom he loved, but "it was not her time to love"; whom he expects one day "will wake and remember and understand." As in Too Late, where the lover holds his peace too long, and sees his beloved give herself to another, but after her death is consoled with the thought that in eternity she will be his. As in the Summum Bonum, which Browning wrote in old age, when he is thinking of his poetess wife, and wherein he declares:

> Truth, that's brighter than gem,
> Trust, that's purer than pearl,
> Brightest truth, purest trust in the universe all were for me
> In the kiss of one girl.

Browning's moral—and many will agree with him—is that love is the prize of life, and he only has succeeded who has won it.

Some account must, however, be taken of those who, having had their chance, have deliberately and finally put love aside. No one except their dear Lord and only Bridegroom can reckon the devoted souls which in all ages have denied themselves to human love that they might the better follow Christ whithersoever he goeth. And no one can be quite insensible to the tender purity and spiritual delicacy of certain saintly faces that have been touched by the passion for Christ. Nor must it be supposed that this is only a cloistered piety, or that it can only be found within convent walls. Most of us know persons who have come under vow to their own souls, and have taken the solitary road, not that they might attain to special degree of sanctity, but that they might render some life service. So brothers for sisters, so sisters for brothers, so children for parents have strengthened their hearts and remained unwed. Sometimes their sacrifice—the last that can be offered—has been detected and rewarded by a gratitude that ought to know no limits. Sometimes it may be unsuspected and receive no return but peevish reproaches. God's guerdon, at least, does not tarry, for the hand has already placed the aureole on those modest, unconscious heads, and filled with fragrance those lives of uncomplaining, unboasting love.

Certain persons have also come to a place where they had the choice of tearing an unworthy love from their lives or dishonoring their souls. Their love had been belittled, or betrayed, or it had been flung aside as a common thing, or it had been dragged in the mire. It had been soiled, and they would no longer give it heart room, so they burned it, saying nothing to any one, but such will carry the marks of the fire till they die. Of these Tennyson was thinking in the Holy Grail, when he described:

> Such a fervent flame of human love
> Which, being rudely blunted, glanced and shot
> Only to holy things, to prayer and praise,
> She gave herself to fast and alms.

This is the transformation of love which, having been sent to the stake for conscience's sake, obtains the martyr's ruby crown.

Within this life the most pitiable of all tragedies, and the most helpless, is a loveless marriage. Just as marriage approaches the estate of heaven for a man and a woman whose souls are one in faith and hope, so a marriage approaches the estate of hell for two persons who have no community of thought or faith. Where, for instance, a man of bright intelligence is tied to a coarse woman, or a spiritual woman united to an evil-living man, it is not wonderful that husband and wife should drift apart, and in the end come to hate one another. One can understand why some speak bitterly of life and rail against marriage. Others show a nobler courage in such a case, who hide their sorrow from the world and carry their heavy cross without speech, fulfilling the will of God with a proud patience, and having the nearer support of his favor till the kindly hand of death break the yoke.

After the victims of this cross providence—but at a long distance—are those who have loved and never been loved. It is surely a very hard lot to be dowered with a wealth of love and find none to receive it. We pity him who takes out a bundle of faded letters and reads them with vain regret, but he is far more to be pitied who has no token because there has been no lover. Ah, the silent sorrow of lonely hearts which have never tasted life's cup of joy! Yet how evident and beneficent their mission in the world, how surely they have fulfilled it! There may be unmarried people who are sour and repellent. If so, bear with them who have sustained a severer loss than friends or goods. But they are not typical of that kind who have the warmest hearts in all the world, who are the chosen refuge of every needy unfortunate, from boys in scrapes and poor people in need, to men and women with some secret sorrow to tell into a sympathetic ear. Their love has not been centered on one, so it embraces a hundred; their interest has not been narrowed to a single home, so it ranges through a city; no lover has monopolized their devotion, so it is poured on the body of Christ. The alabaster box that had been laid aside for a great occasion has been broken, and the house is filled with the odor of the ointment.

BICYCLES AND ELECTRIC CARS VERSUS SUNDAY.

BY REV. C. H. HAMLIN.

Since the arrival of these means of travel many people have become alarmed for the future of the Christian Sabbath. Is this fear reasonable? The Sabbath is an item of inspired jurisprudence, established by now more than three thousand years of successful experience. Its basis is its adaptation to the nature of man. There is no occasion for alarm until human nature changes, when all sorts of mischief may be expected. The present difficulty is not due to any change in human nature, but arises because man's larger control over the forces of the physical world gives him more opportunity to manifest all the nature he has. If some of it happens to be bad, its evil certainly becomes more conspicuous.

When we are alarmed at the course of affairs, we are all too ready to assign the cause to the deterioration of human nature. Thus, when curfew legislation increases in the West, ponderous editorials are published upon the decline of the American family and the irresistible tendency of free institutions to degenerate. The whole matter is probably simpler than the profound editorials, as truth is apt to be. The streets are lit by electricity, and under light almost as good as daylight the children play in the streets and, childlike, never know enough to go in until called.

Out of sight, out of mind. The children no longer under foot, their comfortable parents enjoy their quietness, and wisely (?) don't call them in until they must. If our ancestors had had electric lights they would have had electric difficulties, and even without the lights they attempted curfew laws and for people no longer children. Our unprecedented phenomenon indicates no degeneracy of human nature, but only the arrival of new circumstances and, in the presence of those circumstances, a certain laziness of human nature which, however deplorable, is not new. The present alteration in the observance of Sunday is no epidemic of sudden human degeneracy, but the outbreak of electric cars and bicycles, with State roads as the consequence and corollary of bicycles. All these things have come upon this generation. As a result young blood that has always wanted to travel and lacked the means now finds the opportunity of rather extensive travel upon the Lord's Day, and the long-desired privilege is used with the eagerness of all new and unexpected occasions.

Add to the situation the influx of an immigration from the continent of Europe sufficient to deprive that way of spending the day of any singularity, and the indulgence suddenly becomes extensive; many are perplexed and some, becoming impatient with electric cars and bicycles as the source of innovation and difficulty, devise censure and rebuke. Well, cars and bicycles are machines and there is no moral quality in dynamos or rubber tires. The progress of invention cannot be reversed because some of its incidentals are untoward. We shall have to take advantages and disadvantages together.

It is an occasion for instruction. Our young people are human and therefore open to the reasonable considerations which have hitherto inclined men to believe that a Sabbath was worth while. They do not wish to forfeit for an outdoor holiday the Christian heritage of their fathers, with its vast generation of motive power toward all righteousness. They will have to be told that while exercise upon their wheels will develop just as much muscle upon Sunday as upon any secular day, they cannot have the whole day for the body and also for the spirit. Between the two they will have to choose. They can develop either heels or head, but not both at the same time. Unless their Sunday use of the wheel leaves time and strength for their soul, their soul will wither.

It will have to be stated that a Sunday ride upon the electrics will ventilate their physical systems as thoroughly as a ride upon any other day of the week; but that if they allow it to interfere with regular attendance upon their church, and the habitual discharge of their duty in the instruction of Sunday school classes, and in sustaining Endeavor meetings, that then the currents which fertilize the souls of men will be underfed, while those which develop the flesh will be overfed, with the inevitable results.

It will be objected that such a course is not radical enough; but is anything else reasonable or practicable? If this course is both, then a failure to believe in the sufficiency of preaching it amounts to a belief that God has failed to make men accessible to a true and kind presentation of the gospel. It is not well to believe that humanity will remain permanently inaccessible to right reason. When people no longer respond to right preaching then more than the Sabbath, and not less than the foundations of human society, will be in danger.

RECENT IMPORTANT DISCOVERIES IN EGYPT.

BY S. E. BRIDGMAN.

Egyptian archæologists are rapidly adding to the knowledge of the past of that wonderful country by excavations now progressing under Prof. Flinders Petrie and others in various parts of the land. Armies of workmen are busy in Upper and Lower Egypt and are often rewarded by most valuable finds. On the island of Philæ, above Assouan, we were shown a few weeks ago two tablets, in situ, just discovered, not far from the temple of Isis near the ruins of the old Coptic church. These have been hidden for centuries under great hills of sand. We copy the story as given by one of the explorers, a graduate of Beirut College, under date of March 6, at Assouan:

I inclose a photograph of a stone recently discovered on the island of Philæ. The two pieces of the granite stone were lying in the pavement of a Roman temple discovered at the north end of the island. The great importance of the stones is derived from their being the first stones (one and two-thirds meters long by half a meter each) found up to date with Latin inscriptions upon them, together with hieroglyphics and Greek. Captain Lyons, who has in charge these excavations, and Mr. Borchardt, a German architect from Berlin, decide that these two stones were originally one whole piece and that it must have been sawed into two by the fanatical Copts when they took possession of the island after the evacuation by the Romans.

From a historical point of view they eclipse in importance even the famed Rosetta stone, each line of the inscription being full of historical facts, whereas the Rosetta stone and others of this kind have their incriptions limited to religious matters. The inscriptions speak of a revolt which occurred in Thebes and which had spread as far as the Nubian frontier. Cornelius was sent with an army to suppress the revolt and on his way conquered five cities, among which are mentioned Diospolis, Magua (Thebes) and Coptus. The remaining three cities, namely, Boresis, Cernanice and Ophicon, are now unknown. Cornelius, on his arrival at Nubia, captured the ambassadors of the Nubian king and kept him as captive that the fires of the revolt might not be rekindled. The temple in which the stones were found is a Greek one and in the name of Augustus and is now demolished. The great granite columns, once so stately with their beautiful diorite capitals, had been pulled down from their granite pedestals, which are marked with the circumference of the base of each.

During the four months of excavation we have continually been observing the inimical traces of the fanatic Copts who have not left a single corner untouched or a figure not disfigured. Only yesterday we found a small granite column, two meters high and over a foot in diameter, with a beautiful detached capital. The vertical hieroglyphic lines say that Ptolemy VII. has built an altar for his beloved mother and erected pillars around it as an ornament. Captain Lyons has also found four temples utterly pulled down, three of which have only their paved floors left. As these scenes come daily before my vision the Copts, in their strange and fanatical irruptions into the regions of art, appear to me "as pigmies rummaging the armories of a giant and contending for the possession of weapons which they could not wield." Most of their rubbish houses are built on the island of sandstone hewn down from the Ptolemaic temples which still retain their grandeur and lord it over the insignificant churches of the Copts, whose stones had once been snatched from the ancient temples.

I may add that Professor Petrie has just exhumed a most important tablet, but it has not yet been lifted from the pit.

THE KURDS OF ARMENIA OR THE CHRISTIANS OF AMERICA?

BY REV. W. A. FARNSWORTH, D. D.

To the Patrons of the A. B. C. F. M.: Which are the most effective co-workers in arresting the Lord's work? For many months the civilized world has stood aghast at the horrors reported from Asia Minor. Faithful servants of the American churches have endured almost everything but death, and that in some cases they have looked in the face and momentarily expected Many of their fellow-workers have been killed. The noble pastor of the church in Oorfa, a very accomplished man who studied in Germany, and more than half the members of his church have fallen by the bullet, the scimiter or the bludgeon. Amid all the horrors of two massacres one lone woman, your servant there, remained, an angel of mercy, caring for hundreds of wounded and feeding and clothing thousands. What she has seen and suffered is in some regards more than equaled by the experience of some others. They have seen their dwellings, with all their furniture and clothing, books and precious mementos, plundered and burned by a mad and bloodthirsty mob. They have seen noble educational institutions, the product of years of heroic effort on both their part and on the part of their fellow-workers, destroyed by the same mob. Places of worship built with a little help, it may be, from funds of the American Board, and with great sacrifice on the part of their fellow-Christians, have been, some of them, destroyed, some of them converted into stables and others into mosques. It would seem as if the very demons of hell had been let loose and commissioned to destroy the people who are called by the blessed name of Christ. These scenes have been witnessed in a large part of Asia Minor, a region of about 240,000 square miles. Tens of thousands have been murdered, some of them in ways too horrible to name. As a consequence all business in that land is now paralyzed and hundreds of thousands of men, women and children are suffering from hunger and nakedness and cold.

We find it difficult to express in words our horror of these things. How we abhor the actors in this fiendish work! Savagery has triumphed over civilization, Islam over Christ. Terrible is the wound which evangelical Christianity has suffered. Your servants—the missionaries—throughout that land have suffered about as much, it would seem, as it is possible for human nature to endure. Surely you would not knowingly add to their sufferings. Some of the native preachers, pastors and teachers have died as martyrs, but many of them still live and their suffering is even greater than is that of the missionaries. You do not wish to add to their load of sorrow and suffering. Pardon me, dear friends, when I say that, unconsciously it may be, but really, you are even now adding a tremendous burden to that which is already crushing your brethren, both missionary and native. Hear what a missionary lady writes from Cæsarea:

March 16 It is such a beautiful, sunny day, the first day of Bairam [the Turkish feast to which they had looked forward with very great fear]. So far we see or hear of no disturbance and we have strong hopes that there will be none. But, alas! our hearts are heavy and sad nevertheless. We hear of a terrible cutting down in our Board's appropriations for native agency, a fifty per cent. cutting down.

What a dreadful blow to the work at a time when much more than the usual amount is really needed to help the people, who will be unable to do as much as usual for the support of their preachers and teachers! After all that the sufferings of this land have cost, this seems almost "the unkindest cut of all"—that the Christians in America cannot arouse themselves and deny themselves enough to help on the work of Christ in this land, but must allow the awful word, retrenchment, to sound in our ears. This is calamity heaped upon calamity, and how can we bear it! I thought we were crushed enough already, but it seems that there is more to follow.

This is a heartfelt cry of one of your servants in one station very mildly expressed. Every one of the missionaries of that station and every one of your 153 American laborers whom you have sent to that land is shocked, stunned by the report of that reduction. And what think you of their 800 fellow-workers—pastors, licensed preachers, teachers, colporteurs, Bible readers and translators—to whom this means, now when many of them have been plundered, aid of but fifty cents where we have before given a dollar. To many this means starvation. Remember that formerly there was little business to which any one might turn. Now all business is utterly paralyzed.

When the Prudential Committee, which is simply the servant of the churches and practically obeys the orders of the churches, distributing your gifts, sent out that order for a fifty per cent. reduction the missionaries in Constantinople immediately held a consultation and they sent back to the committee very bitter cries. Mr. Dwight says:

I feel that all these discussions of the means of maintaining in the interior the missionaries who have suffered so much in order to hold their posts bid fair to be nullified by the necessity of cutting down the appropriations by fifty per cent.

Thus he fears that what the Kurds could not accomplish this reduction will. Dr. Greene says:

Your letter announcing that the Prudential Committee had cut off fifty per cent. of the estimates of our mission for native agency was read to a full meeting of the committee ad interim last Monday, and gave us a dreadful shock. We should not dare, dear Dr. Smith, to communicate such intelligence to our prostrated Armenian communities. For one, I would rather, a thousand times, be recalled than do it.

Has any missionary wished to be recalled because of the work of the Kurds?

Hear what Dr. Herrick says, when speaking of this same reduction:

And now how shall we communicate to our brethren and sisters in the interior, and through them to our orphaned and desolated churches and congregations, the news? How shall we ring out the knell that their brethren of the American churches are to give them for 1896 but half of the reduced sum of 1895? This will close our churches, scatter the congregations, break up schools, paralyze our publication work. . . . We take the responsibility, till we can hear from you again, of paying salaries on the former basis, of not joining the Turk in destroying or closing chapels, schools and the press. The Turkish scimiter kills only the body. We cannot go further and kill hope and faith and courage among our heart-broken people.

Nothing but the failure of the churches in America to furnish the funds necessary to carry on the work of the Board could compel these men to utter such bitter cries. They are neither cowards nor alarmists. In these times that "try men's souls" they have brought new honor to the name American.

Now, my dear brethren, friends and patrons of the American Board, what reply shall the Prudential Committee send back to your agents in Constantinople and through them to the 800 native laborers in the three Turkey missions? That committee is simply your agent. It speaks for you. If you say, "We are too poor to do more," must not the result be far worse as regards evangelical Christianity than all that has been accomplished by the savagery of the Kurds?

THE SONG SPARROW.

BY IDA WHIPPLE BENHAM.

Listen! from yonder maple tree in bloom
The sparrow pours abroad a rivulet
Of dancing notes to make the soul forget
Tempest and frost and all the hours of gloom.
The bird is wise; he sings above the tomb
Of buried hopes, of buried sweet regret,
"Sweetheart!" he sings, "the world is happy yet!"
And wakes the morn to laughter and perfume.

'Tis such a miracle, this rapturous change
From winter to the glory of the spring,
Almost it seems beyond my glad belief.
How shall I grasp the truth, familiar, strange—
The bough transformed, the worm on azure wing,
The joy new-risen from the old grave of grief!

An artist's wife when riding through a rural neighborhood with a friend pointed out a house which was painted in colors that ruined each other. "O, the people who live there don't mind it," said her friend. "But think of the soul a person must have not to mind," was the reply in tragically earnest tones. It is not just, however, to press this judgment, as in many homes the women, who are most capable of deciding such questions and who suffer most from glaring inharmony, are not consulted. Then, too, the purses of our housekeepers are not usually so well filled as to allow great freedom in artistic furnishings. For these two reasons women have not studied to educate the artistic side of their natures or to express their "souls" by their surroundings. But the educated mind can turn a small amount of money to good account and by degrees make the home, indoors and out, a well equipped laboratory, shall we say, for developing true family life. Artistic reform in some of our houses, however, would consist not of new acquisitions but in eliminating objectionable, dust-catching contrivances that really add nothing to comfort or beauty. Of course there are certain dear old household possessions which may not harmonize with their surroundings, but these should be the last to go.

Much oftener than in years past do we hear wealthy parents say, "I want my daughter trained to self-support and thus fortified against sudden reverses of fortune." Is there not a danger of carrying this idea too far? Do the fathers who stand ready to expend hundreds of dollars for the special training of their daughters to fit them for self-supporting positions which they may never fill realize the neglect in general development which the girls suffer within their own homes? Yet every business man recognizes the fact that, in a boy, habits of precision, accuracy, thoroughness, attention to detail and other homely virtues, go a long way to supplement the lack of special training, and constitute a good foundation for future success. Similar qualities in his sister may be developed by making her responsible for the actual doing of regular household tasks, or for her intelligent and personal supervision to see that they are properly executed. One who has had the care of planning the meals for the household, kept her own wardrobe in repair, balanced weekly accounts, kept closets and drawers in order and attended to the numberless details which are so necessary to the well-ordered home, stands a better chance to earn her living, if the emergency arises, than one who has neglected this commonplace means of self-culture and relied wholly on technical knowledge.

THE SCIENCE OF FOOD.

VI. CONDIMENTS AND FLAVORS.

BY M. V. SHALER.

"Whatever pleases the palate nourishes" is a maxim as ancient as the time of Democritus. Modern science has proven the truth of this maxim and shown why condiments are no more necessary in the palace of connoisseur than in the hut of barbarian, why they are as eagerly used by the natives of Labrador as by the swarthy sons of the tropics, why they are the property of Mohammedan, Confucian, Buddhist, Gentile and Jew, of all castes, races and civilizations. Acting principally upon the nervous system through the sense of smell, condiments stimulate the flow of both the saliva and the gastric juices. They materially aid digestion, and the familiar phrase, "to make the mouth water," states a physiological fact. These are some of the sentiments uttered by Dr. Green in her admirable book, Food Products of the World. Like the animal we have used instinct and taste to guide us in the selection of our food, but the time has come when thought and reason should take their place. To the law of natural selection we are indebted for much that is good, but to the palate, which may be said to be the synonym for taste, we owe some unhygienic practices.

Though condiments have been known to all nations from time immemorable and their use has been a physiological necessity, they have been more instrumental in the development of a satiated palate than almost any other one cause. The trend of civilization has been toward greater variety, more complex dishes and more highly seasoned food. After primitive man learned that one savory herb improved his pot of stew he discovered that two and three and more added to the flavor, afforded him a new dish, as it were. His civilized brother has not fallen behind in number, and even to the most delicate and varied of flavored meats, terrapin, he adds mace, salt, pepper, sherry and all the rest of the collection of condiments.

How far we may go in the use of high seasoning depends upon individual capacity to digest. Unquestionably condiments stimulate appetite and force us to eat more than we need and to eat what we ought not. From mild flavors we grow to want pungent ones. Digestion is over-stimulated, becomes weakened by overwork and the natural sequence follows. On the other hand, tasteless food is no more a natural food than is the highly seasoned. Although experimentation has shown that meat entirely without seasoning is wholly digested, yet this does not prove that the digestibility of food does not depend upon its palatableness. We know too well by experience that it does for most of us. Unseasoned food is digestible, but nature has given the palate in order to stimulate appetite. Without it we do not eat and only in the abuse of it are we at fault.

No greater test proves the skill of a cook than the use of condiments. Of all seasonings salt stands first. The ancients gave preference in their cookery to the aromatic herbs, but salt with them was the "condiment of condiments." Salt is a physical necessity, second in importance only to water. Man and beast need it. Cattle die for want of it and wars have been waged because of it. Though salt beds are so abundant in the world, yet we have been the victims of adulteration. Rigid inspection, however, has corrected the abuse almost entirely, as it has in other manufactured seasonings. Pepper, mustard, cinnamon, spices, etc., have been so grossly adulterated that our digestions, without doubt, have often struggled with powdered bark, sawdust, hulls and other uncongenial substances. A little pure spice is an aid to health, but much and impure is fatal.

Germans use an extensive list of garden herbs, while the French draw from the whole world's supply. The Chinaman clings to his combinations of various spices like a true ancient that he is. His "soy," or "shoyer," another name for our ketchup, we are told, is used throughout the East, but is best from its native heath. Its basis is the soy bean cultivated since primitive times in Japan. It is so much in demand that in Japan alone there are 10,682 firms engaged in its manufacture. The Japanese use it at every meal.

The list of condiments covers an extensive ground, but literature abounds with their history and we who use them should "run and read." For instance, the Spanish proverb, "Four persons are necessary to the making of a salad dressing—a spendthrift for oil, a miser for vinegar, a counselor for salt and a madman to stir it all up," is one of many bits of food literature such as may be found for the seeking.

FRESH AIR STUDIES.

FIRST FRUITS OF THE EARTH.

BY H. E. PARKHURST.

When daffodils begin to peer,
With heigh! the doxy over the dale,
Why, then comes in the sweet of the year;
For the red blood reigns in the winter's pale.
—Shakespeare.

Spring's pioneer flowers, like the world's pioneer workers of every sort, are greeted with peculiar admiration. Besides, there is a marked vigor and something like personality in those alert plants, which are so eager for life that they almost crack the earth's frozen shell to thrust out their bright eyes. The names best remembered through the year are spring's first arrivals.

All flowering plants are divided into the two great classes of exogens and endogens, which comprise, respectively, the more elaborate and the simpler types of such vegetable growth as develops a true blossom, from which are excluded ferns, mosses, lichens and sea weeds. It is the endogens, the underlings, that take the initiative in spring's botanic display. To the uppermost of our nineteen endogen families belongs the commonest and humblest herb, grass, that needs only a sheltered spot and two broad smiles of the sun to awake a vivid flush in February. For early brilliant blossoms we are much indebted to another, the amaryllis family, also endogens, with its three favorite species: first, that jewel of all the poets, the golden daffodils—rooted sunshine, baby suns giving their mite to warm and beautify the earth; next, those lesser lights, jonquils; and, thirdly, the dainty snowdrop, that carries into spring the pure taste of winter without its coldness. An equally delicate species is the lowly but conspicuous crocus, whose violet, yellow, white and purple cups seem to stand directly on the ground like earthy bubbles.

But the earliest stir of plant blood is found, not in leaf nor blossom, but in the freshening tints of various kinds of bark. Some birches become bronzed, willows brightly yellow, prominently marking the landscape, while certain briers and osiers gradually redden until, by the end of March, their bare branches glow like coals of fire—a "burning bush."

The best pleasure of spring botany is experienced only by the elect—those who put on rubber boots and roam through the ooze and splashy blackness of a swamp; for it is here that endogens, which have an intemperate partiality for water, find their paradise, and, amid decaying leaves and foul earth, the delicate tint and tissue of many an upspringing blossom is no inapt emblem of a disembodied spirit emerging from its clay. In such surroundings, or in somewhat dryer but rich woods, one finds many representatives of the lily family, including the trillium or wake-robin — one species with dark purple, another with pure white petals—and the dog-tooth violet, which is not a violet at all, but like a minute yellow lily with curiously spotted leaves, and the whole plant rather insulted by being called "adder's tongue." Later comes the popular and cultivated lily of the valley, Solomon's seal, true and false, and the Indian turnip, with its curious over-arching spathe, not a handsome but an interesting and ingenious notion of nature. Early in April a large bush or low tree called spice-bush is entirely covered with sweet-scented yellow blossoms before any leaves appear. Squirrel corn has a pretty blossom resembling dielytra, and gets its name from its root consisting of several yellow grains instead of a single bulb. About the middle of April one can find the anemone, violet, early saxifrage, spring beauty and hepatica. All of these last named are in the higher or exogenous division, which furnishes by far the larger proportion of inflorescence throughout the year.

BENJAMIN FRANKLIN.

BY JEANNETTE A. GRANT.

"I cannot place Franklin second to any other American."—Horace Greeley.

Benjamin Franklin was born with a genius for success in its best sense. In looking into his history we are not surprised to find that he was a "Sunday child," the date of his birth being Jan. 6, 1706. To good old Boston town belongs the honor of being his birthplace and boyhood home. Many a recent pilgrim has sought in reverent mood the few relics that tell of the illustrious boy, whose fame is world-wide. Few, indeed, are the relics, but every American boy and girl should know about them.

In his boyhood we find him far from perfect. He was a good deal like all other bright boys. He liked his own way and sometimes took it, though always sorry afterward for the pain he caused his parents and striving with all his might to make amends. He was fortunate in having a good inheritance from upright and intelligent ancestors. From his father's family he inherited the sturdy traits of a long line of English freemen, who followed the manly and muscular trade of village blacksmiths. His father was their worthy descendant, a man of many accomplishments, wise, genial and agreeable to look upon. His opinions were much prized by his townspeople and his house was the resort of the most influential men of the town. Franklin's mother was a daughter of Peter Folger, a man much honored for his learning and advanced views. Benjamin was his father's tenth son and used to recall sitting at table with twelve other children, his brothers and sisters. It was a loving and cheerful family circle and remained a bright memory to Franklin throughout the years of his long and eventful life.

His father wanted to make him a minister but with his large family found it impossible to send the boy to school after his tenth year. So poor Benjamin, who was fond of books, had to leave school and go to work in his father's soap and candle factory. He did not like the work at all and grumbled about it, but was sensible enough to listen to his father's advice and try to do his best. Years after he recalled his father's frequent quotation of the proverb: "Seest thou a man diligent in his calling, he shall stand before kings." The words had proved true and the boy who tried to be faithful to his disagreeable duty had indeed been called to appear before kings and nobles and the wisest men of the day.

With all his hard work he contrived to find time for his beloved reading and for the sports that boys enjoy. He was fond of swimming and could perform more feats in the water than any of his boy friends. He made a pair of paddles to wear on his hands, shaped like a painter's palette with a hole for the thumb. With these he was able to swim rapidly but he found that they tired his wrists. At another time, while flying a kite, he decided to take a swim in a neighboring pond. So he tied the string of the kite to a stake at the edge of the water letting the kite remain in the air. While swimming it occurred to him to take the string of the kite in his hands and lying on his back in the water allow the kite to draw him about. This sport he enjoyed for some time, occasionally being obliged to stop and let the kite mount a little to make up for the strain upon it.

The books that Franklin enjoyed while yet a lad would hardly interest a boy of today. But that only proves that with too many books to choose from young readers are unable to cultivate their power of application. His first book, which he dearly loved, was Bunyan's Pilgrim's Progress, and upon this work he modeled, to some extent, his own style as a writer and speaker. Then there was a volume written by the author of Robinson Crusoe, called Essay upon Projects, which was filled with plans for doing good to everybody by improving the laws and methods of transacting business, for instituting benevolent societies, making good roads and improving the schools. These projects have been carried out in most civilized countries since the time of Defoe, and Franklin's great interest in all kinds of improvements shows that he read carefully and pondered the subjects well.

Another little book of a serious nature was written by the great Cotton Mather and was called Essays to Do Good. To this Franklin said he owed his desire to be a good and useful citizen. Certainly no one ever lived up to his convictions any better than he. With all his great responsibilities of state affairs and his efforts for large enterprises, he was never too busy to do little acts of genuine kindness to those about him, or to write friendly letters to those from whom he was separated. Many a man courted as Franklin was would have assumed unapproachable manners, but he was always cheery and unaffected, an inspiration to the company about him. His was the dignity of a truly noble character.

Franklin's father thought every boy should be taught a trade whereby to support himself. Circumstances led to Benjamin's becoming a printer, and this proved just the business for the youth who was so fond of literature. He learned his trade thoroughly and was a most successful printer, editor, compiler, publisher, bookbinder, bookseller and stationer. He made his own lampblack and ink and advertised them well, together with various other wares. This he did in his newspaper, the Pennsylvania Gazette, which was the best newspaper of its day. His career as a business man lasted twenty years, from 1728 to 1748, and was carried on in the city of Philadelphia, whither he went at the age of seventeen and for a time worked for others.

It would take a long time to tell of the endless public and private enterprises that Franklin was engaged in during this portion of his life. People began to have such confidence in his judgment that any scheme to which he put his name was sure to become popular. Through his influence the streets were lighted, paved and kept clean, fire companies were organized, libraries, schools and hospitals were founded. When he was about thirty-four he invented the famous open stove, which still bears his name. He refused the patent on his invention offered by the governor of Pennsylvania because, as he said, we enjoy great advantages from the inventions of others and should be glad of an opportunity to serve others by any inventions of our own! You see Franklin not only believed in the Golden Rule but put it into practice. He always tried to make things better for his fellowmen. Even smoky chimneys were of interest to him and he wrote an essay to tell people how to build their chimneys in a way to avoid the smoke trouble.

What Franklin did to make his country respected and honored by foreign nations is recorded in our history. No other man sent on his missions to European courts would have had the patience, tact and thorough good will that made him so successful. It is delightful to read about his life abroad, but it thrills us with joy to find that, after his work in foreign fields had been accomplished and he had come back to his native land, an old man of seventy-nine, he was as ready as ever to serve the people who could not get along without him.

In these days of clubs for young and old it is interesting to read about the young men's club organized by Franklin when he was about twenty-one. It was called the Junto and had a local nickname of the Leathern Apron Club. In its far-reaching results it was like our modern Young Men's Christian Association but, like everything Franklin carried on, it was original and unique.

What greater thing is there for two human souls than to feel that they are joined for life—to strengthen each other in all labor, to rest on each other in all sorrow, to minister to each other in all pain, to be one with each other in silent, unspeakable memories at the moment of the last parting?—George Eliot.

A SENSIBLE LUNCH FOR TRAVELERS.

One of our contributors criticises an article entitled A Hearty Lunch, which appeared recently in this department, on the ground that nearly all the edibles recommended were sweets, and offers a bill of fare which may be less æsthetic, but is surely more hygienic. She says:

Few women can ride for twenty-four hours in the steam cars without being greatly fatigued, and if that day grows into two, three or four the tired traveler certainly needs food more nutritious than cookies, frosted cakes, tarts and turnovers. Sweetened food is rarely satisfying, especially for one who is weary, and, if my own experience and that of friends count for anything, I may say that the traveler turns with almost loathing from the sweetened preparations which are too often put up, with mistaken kindness, by loving hands.

May I not, in imagination, empty Helen Parker's lunch-box and fill it again with what I think would be more appreciated by the ordinary traveler? Mrs. Blossom's sandwiches we will put back, as they are always desirable for any lunch, or, if the journey be a long one, put in the uncut rolls and a little porcelain jar of butter, another jar being filled with chopped ham seasoned with mustard, vinegar and salt, and let the tourist prepare her own sandwiches. Olives will be relished with the bread and butter and should always be included, also sardines with the accompanying lemon, while delicious stuffed eggs—each one daintily wrapped in tissue paper—should by no means be forgotten. Thirst nearly always increases during travel and the system craves acids, which may be supplied by oranges, apples or other fresh fruits. A bottle of lemon juice will be a most welcome addition, a little of it to be added to each cup of water which the traveler drinks.

Jelly and crackers are sure to be appreciated, although when at home one would not think of such a combination. But let the jelly be a variety which has "tartness" and the crackers the finger-shaped variety, long and narrow. If cakes must be added let them be as plain as possible, but I should leave them out altogether.

If you think my bill of fare less acceptable than Mrs. Blossom's, just submit the question to any sensible physician and see what he will say. E. S. W.

CHILDREN OF THE DESERT.

The members of The Congregationalist's Oriental Tour, and possibly others, will be interested to know of the little school at Gormah, Egypt, across the river from Luxor. The ladies of that party will remember leaving a sum of money with Mrs. Nichol, wife of the Luxor missionary, to use for the children of the desert, who could not cross the river to come to them. A letter lately received from Mrs. Nichol mentions that twenty were attending the school, of whom nine were girls. The little girl Zenobia, who so won the hearts of members of our party, and in whose interest the thought of the school was first developed, unfortunately, is not among them. The missionary's wife has made special but unsuccessful efforts to find her, and writes: "Perhaps she has been married and gone to another town, or perhaps she has gone to another town with her mother. I saw her once since you left and gave her your message. She was all smiles and said you were a 'nice lady, good lady.' This is the last I have seen or heard of her."

But we hope that little Fatima, Achmet and the others, who ran with their water jars by the side of our donkeys, may still be benefited by having a teacher among them. Though the missionary's wife does not say so, we are sure that her gold pieces for this purpose must have vanished, and we are also sure that the founders of the school will not want to abandon it. A little money goes a great way among these poor people, and some of the party having already expressed a desire to send more, we will gladly put with it and forward any sent us for that purpose. H. W. D.

ODDS AND ENDS.

The question whether or not disease is disseminated by books in public libraries has been twice investigated by the American Library Association, and in no instance was it able to trace spread of disease to this source. In 1872 a severe epidemic of small pox prevailed in Boston, whose public library has an annual circulation of more than 2,000,000 volumes. A medical man of large experience then proved beyond a doubt that in no case was the infection connected with the use of books. Nevertheless proper precautions should be taken to disinfect books and to burn those which have been handled by scarlet fever patients.

One of our gentleman readers objects to a code of manners for men that is adapted only to women. For instance, he claims that those of his sex who wear a full beard or moustache should be allowed to tuck a napkin beneath the chin whenever circumstances seem to require. It need not be kept there during the entire meal, but a man should be allowed the liberty to adjust it according to his own estimate of danger to his clothing, and subsequent mortification on account of accidents at mealtime. Furthermore, the effort to avoid accidents, he maintains, hinders one from being as easy in conversation at the table as good breeding requires.

Additional interest is given to the sketch of Franklin in another column from the fact that a commemorative tablet has just been placed on the house which he occupied in Paris. At the time it was situated in Passy, then a village four miles from the city, but the structure is now a pavilion, near the entrance of a garden, in the Rue Singer, and at the further end of the garden is a large modern building occupied by a Jesuit school. Tradition says that Franklin's was the first house in France on which a lightning conductor was erected. When the aged ambassador started to return to America he was too weak to bear the jolting of a carriage and Queen Marie Antoinette placed at his disposal one of her litters, borne by a couple of Spanish mules, by which he was conveyed to the port of embarkation.

Ninety families from the tenement house district in New York city last summer engaged in farming on the 300 acres given for that purpose on Long Island. The person who made the greatest success was a woman. The Altruist Interchange says of her:

She had only one-third of an acre and the same proportion of fertilizer as the others. She worked early and late, kept her own land in fine condition and pulled up the weeds on her neighbors' farms. These she dried, burned and then used the ashes to enrich her land. In this way she raised a splendid crop, potatoes, cabbages and Brussels sprouts being her specialties. By her efforts she succeeded in helping her husband to dress better, work better and get a better position, and now they are saving, with the $134 she made for a nucleus, the money to buy themselves a place out of town, where she can go on with her work of farming.

Closet and Altar

Blessed be God, who has made earth and heaven one in the heart's unquenchable thirst for him!

Thou Life within my life than self more near!
Thou veiled Presence infinitely clear!
From all illusive shows of sense I flee
To find my center and my rest in thee.
. . . . . .
How can I call thee who art always here?
How shall I praise thee who art still most dear?
What may I give thee save what thou hast given?
And whom but thee have I in earth or heaven?

—Eliza Scudder.

Christ, the Spirit, is with us, and he is with us today. But are we in harmony with that Spirit? What we need today is contemplation, pious meditation. If we could take a morning hour and an evening hour and devote it to communion with God did it ever occur to you what wonderful Christians we might be? The need of the day is that the pew and pulpit should have more time for contemplation.

The thing we have most to fear from is not the liveliness of the sinners, but the deadness of the saints—that remoteness from God, that inexperience of the great realities that makes God a name and a report rather than a felt person, and the superb verities the possession of the few rather than the realization of the many.—Dr. Parkhurst.

In the home of God, of which Christ speaks, we shall all find God. We shall find him always; find him without painful and wearisome search; we shall never lose him. In what ways God will make his presence perceived and felt by us we cannot tell. But to those of us whose chief trouble is that our vision of God is continually clouded; that our sense of his presence is dull and vague at the best, and is often lost altogether; that we are so wanting in love for other men and in spiritual perception that we fasten upon what is most imperfect in them, are vexed by it, irritated by it, repelled by it, instead of seeing in them possibilities of an infinite perfection . . . to those of us I say whose chief trouble it is that we seem to be living in a world where everything conceals God from us, it is a hope which kindles the heart to rapture that the time is coming when we shall live in a world where everything will reveal him.—R. W. Dale.

I look to thee in every need,
And never look in vain;
I feel thy touch, Eternal Love,
And all is well again.
The thought of thee is mightier far Than sin and pain and sorrow are.

—Samuel Longfellow.

Heavenly Father, be with me this day in my going out and in my coming in. Make me watchful and circumspect in my walk and conversation. Put thy fear into my heart that I may be kept from sinning against thee. Direct me, O Lord, in all my doings, by thy gracious spirit, and further me with thy continual help: that in all my works, begun, continued and ended in thee, I may glorify thy holy name: and finally, by thy mercy, attain unto everlasting life, through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

35. Zebec. (Z-beck.)

Correct answers to No. 29 arrived very promptly from A. S. B., Kingston; G. O. Fay, Hartford, Ct.; H. L. B., Evanston, Ill.; H. H. Sherbrooke, Quebec; C. A. Porter, Windsor Locks, Ct; W. H. Barrows, Southbury, Ct.; W. H. Black, Minneapolis, Minn.; H. H., New York, N. Y.; Nillor, Middlebury Springs, Vt.; L. B. Emerson, Brattleboro, Vt.; E. M. Stubbs, Rockland, Me.; F. E. Cotton, Woburn, Mass. Other solutions were hardly correct—one being "$110.23 due town," and another "owed town $16.89."

In the printed answer to No. 26 the word "Mendacity" should read "Mendicity."

Solutions received to Tangles of March 26: P. Jennie Stone, Shelburne, 27, 28, 29, 30, 31; Mrs. G. E. Aiken, Newton, 31; D. E. Stone, Athol, 29; H. H. Ricker, Jacksonville, Fla., 29; F. E. J., Norwich, Ct., 31; Nillor, Middletown Springs, Vt., 27, 28, 29, 31, 32.

WHO IS A GENTLEMAN?

The question is answered somewhat at length by the late Cardinal Newman in these words:

The true gentleman carefully avoids whatever may cause a jar or a jolt in the mind of those with whom he is cast—all clashing of opinion or collision of feeling, all restraint or suspicion or gloom or resentment. his great concern being to make every one at ease and at home. He has his eyes on all his company, he is tender towards the bashful, gentle toward the distant, and merciful toward the absurd. He can recollect to whom he is speaking; he guards against unseasonable allusions or topics which may irritate; he is seldom prominent in conversation, and never wearisome. He makes light of favors when he does them, and seems to be receiving when he is conferring. He never speaks of himself except when compelled, never defends himself by a mere retort; he has no ears for slander or gossip, is scrupulous in imputing motives to those who interfere with him, and interprets everything for the best.

He is never mean or little in his disputes, never takes unfair advantage, never mistakes personalities or sharp sayings for arguments, or insinuates evil which he dare not say out. From long-sighted prudency he observes the maxim of the ancient sage, that we should ever conduct ourselves toward our enemy as if he were one day to be our friend. He has too much good sense to be affronted at insults, and is too well employed to remember injuries. He is patient, forbearing and resigned on philosophical principle; he submits to pain because it is inevitable, to bereavement because it is irreparable, and to death because it is his destiny.

The common problem, yours, mine, every one's,
Is, not to fancy what were fair in life,
Provided it could be—but finding first
What may be, then find how to make it fair
Up to our means.
This world's not blot for us, nor blank;
It means intensely, and means good;
To find its meaning is my meat and drink.

The Conversation Corner.

DEAR CORNERERS: To begin with I will insert two letters which the D. F. left out of the papers where they belonged. But he keeps sending me proofs of them, calling them "live matter." I should think a California boy on a burro would be very much alive!

I have also received some fragrant blossoms from the C. children in South Carolina, and Edwin L. writes from Sierra Madre, Cal.:

We have roses here in winter that you can't put your arm around, the bushes are so big. We have a burro and love to ride on him very much; his name is James Whitcomb Riley.

HAVERHILL, MASS.

Dear Mr. Martin: . . . We spent a week in Boston and saw very interesting things. Sunday we went to the Old North Church, where the signal lights for Paul Revere were hung out, and we saw two silver plates which King George gave the church. We visited the Art Museum and saw a raised map of Greece and a model of the Parthenon. We went into the Public Library. The staircase is of yellow marble. Half way up stairs are two very large lions, lying down but very wide awake. At the top of the staircase is a picture of the Seven Muses painted on the wall, which is very beautiful. JULIA B.

I should like to have happened into the Public Library when Julia was there. Sometimes I wonder if the children whom I see there enjoying the paintings and statuary are not perhaps Cornerers. The other day, in another Boston library, I saw a boy whom I thought looked good enough to be a Cornerer—and, sure enough, a little while afterwards he came into the office to see me and proved to be a particular correspondent from the Connecticut Valley!

Do you remember that in the Corner of March 5 I gave you a batch of letters from "New Members," in alphabetical order, leaving off in the middle of the alphabet? Now I will go on with the list from that point, although in the meantime the division from A to N has filled up—but those must wait.

FAYETTEVILLE, N. Y.

Dear Mr. Martin: I want very much to be a Cornerer. May I? I am eight years old and I am in the third grade at school. I like to read the Cornerers' page. HAROLD O.

Mr. Martin; Dear Sir: I read in the May B.'s letter in the Corner of Jan. 30 about her having ore from the Charlemont mine. I have some gold and silver ores from there, and also a specimen of the ore from which sulphuric acid is made. I have a cousin in Mt. Holyoke College in the class of '96. I enjoy the Corner very much. I inclose stamp for certificate of membership. CHARLES P.

What treasures you have!

The next letter was written by a little boy in New York State to his father in Boston, but I happened to see it and begged permission to read it to you. He is eight years old, and this is probably his first experience on the typewriter!

Dear Papa: My Kittie that ran away, has come back again, he came back yesterday afternoon, he is awful big and not thin, the two cats do not like each other at all and wount agree, the little one is awful scratchie, we know it is he because he jumped up on the libery window just as he used to, I don't know whitch I like the best. The kitty that ran away, the bigest, cried tears came out of his eyes and he cried hard do'nt you think it was funny that he shuld cry when he got back again and that he should come back after being away so long, gaga [doubtless home dialect for Grandma.—MR. M.] thinks that somebody took him away and he found his way back here. I am getting along finely at school, I got the composion medal, it is given out once a month and I got it, margaret has had it, the real medal, twice and may have it again. I thank you for the stamps very mutch, I have made 5 cents on stamps and traided a good many. Is either of the composions spelled right whitch of these is right or are neither, composion or composhion. I hope that you can read this even if it is so mistaky.

HINSDALE, N. H.

Dear Mr. Martin: I should like to join the Corner if I may. I like to read the little letters very much. I will be ten years old next September. I go to church and Sunday school and Junior Society.

Your loving friend, EMMA R.

KANSAS CITY, MO.

Dear Mr. Martin: I want to be a Cornerer very much. I am nine years old and am in the fourth grade. We used to have a Maltese kitten and we called him Tiglath-pileser, but now we have a black cat and papa named her Snowball. Next door is a big, black, curly-haired dog, whose name is Lion. Across the street is a goat. The goat came up in our yard one day and Lion was there too. Lion backed away from the goat, not liking its appearance. I guess you can imagine how it looked. Here is something my little sister Helen said at kindergarten the other day. The workmen are just putting in the gas-pipes on our street. Helen's teacher asked what was going on in the earth where the flowers were. Helen spoke up and said: "Das pipes." Robert asked how old you were. I should judge by your picture you were about thirty. Is that right?

Your faithful reader, KATHARINE S.

Ask the "Youthful Cornerer"—she seemed to have taken notes when she visited me!

DANVERS, MASS.

Dear Mr. Martin: As I have not seen a letter in the Corner from Danvers I thought I would write you of some places of interest within a few minutes' walk of my home. There is the site of Samuel Parris's church; the General Gage house, where he came in 1774 to spend the summer (with him came two companies of British soldiers, and the Danvers boys made it so lively for them that they were under arms nearly every night); the Rebecca Nourse house and monument; the training field from which soldiers marched to the French and Indian, the Revolutionary and later wars. If you and forty Cornerers will come to Danvers and make me a call next summer I will show you these places and many others. I would like very much to become a Cornerer. HAROLD S.

What do the forty say to that? By the map Danvers does not appear to be more than fifteen miles from Boston. At any rate, Harold is very kind to invite us.

SPOKANE, WN.

Dear Mr. Martin: I hope you will get some more about the Eskimo boy. And would you send me some hints about raccoons and moles?

CARRIE S.

If you will ask the cashier of the Old National Bank of your city he might tell you about Pomiuk in his own country, as he was a member of the expedition that brought him to the World's Fair. What Corner naturalist can tell Carrie about those animals? Carrie must tell us in due time as to the action taken by the "Anti Squirrel Convention" at Spokane—see Corner Scrapbook for April 9.

OTISFIELD, ME.

Dear Mr. Martin: I read The Congregationalist Conversation Corner and would like to join it. I am nine years old and live on a farm. I have no brother or sister, but have pet cats, doves, ducks, hens and a lamb.

ARTHUR S.

Come in, Arthur. Country boys are the very ones I want in our membership.

Four others wrote about Pomiuk—Walter R., St. Louis, Mo.; Edward R., Covert, Mich.; Henry S., Elgin, Ill.; Arthur S., Hyde Park, Mass. To them I have sent Pomiuk receipts and Newfoundland stamps (when requested) and certificates to all. The remaining letters from S to Z must go back into the Drawer.

CORNER SCRAP-BOOK.

The Bear at Home. Mr. Long, an acute observer of nature and a very pleasant narrator of what he observes, tells in the Youth's Companion of "Moween, the bear," in the forest, as contrasted with the traveling bear we are accustomed to see. He can dance and box and wrestle, but he does it for fun, and no children, save the wild little children of the woods, ever catch a glimpse of him. He is something of a humorist, too, in his own way. When not hungry he will go out of his course to frighten a bullfrog, for no other reason than just to see him jump. It is immensely amusing to see him twist his head and wrinkle his eyebrows as each successive frog says "ke-dunk!" and goes splashing away over the lily-pads. A pair of cubs are as playful as young foxes, and much more comical because of their extreme awkwardness. Simmo, my Indian guide, tells me that they will sometimes run away and hide when they hear the mother bear returning to the den. No amount of coaxing will bring them back till she searches diligently to find them. It would be well for our young readers to make a study of this playfulness and love of fun in different animals. Do all young animals love play, like human children?

Those Scared Elephants. But even if bears frighten bullfrogs, is it right for men to frighten their fellow-creatures, the lower animals? The question has been asked in regard to the incident of the elephants in Barnum and Bailey's circus, who were thrown into a fearful panic by a rat purposely placed among them by the managers, as told in the Scrapbook of April 2. We should say No, most decidedly. The only apparent justification would be the claim that it was an experiment in the interest of science, being witnessed by several scientific men. But could not this knowledge, if really necessary, have been obtained in some other way less painful to the poor animals? Scientists and editors are not above the operation of the Golden Rule. How would these gentlemen have enjoyed an experiment in which forty wild animals, say bears or elephants, should suddenly dash into their company and keep them in mortal terror for an hour—just to see how they would act?

How the Children Read in School. There must have been many funny incidents in the old days of the "deestrick schule," when large classes of big boys and girls stood up in rows and read out of the "Village Reader" or "American First Class Book." Here is one instance recently furnished to the Scrap-book by a Boston clergyman. It happened on the South Shore, where a boy, always called "Adder" (whatever his proper name may have been), depended upon his older and more scholarly brother to prompt him in every emergency. The piece was the favorite Marco Bozarris, and he had mastered the two first lines:

> At midnight, in his guarded tent,
> The Turk was dreaming of the hour—

but the word "suppliance" in the third line was too much for him. When he hesitated, his brother immediately whispered, "Skip it, Adder," and he read on in a loud voice:

> When Greece, her knee in skip-it-Adder bent!

Another quotation, though less classical, is reported from an equally authoritative source as happening in Connecticut. The sentence was, "If you see a worm do not step on it." But the big boy slowly read it, "If you see a warm doughnut, step on it!" As a matter of fact, however, he, or any one of his amused classmates, would doubtless have made a more kindly disposition of that article if they had seen it at the noon hour!

LESSON FOR MAY 3. Luke 17: 5–19.

FAITH.

BY REV. A. E. DUNNING, D.D.

Faith is simply confidence in God based on knowledge of him. Such knowledge is gained by study of his word and works and by experience of communion with him. The more thoroughly we know God the more completely we shall trust him, the more confidently we shall face the difficulties which servants of God must meet, and discharge the duties he lays upon them.

The achievements of Christianity are the triumphs of faith. Its adherents have revolutionized the world, starting without visible resources, but with a heroism which has become sublime and a might that has become irresistible because of their confidence in God. One of the most significant prayers ever recorded was that of the disciples of Christ, "Lord, increase our faith." Our Lord's answer, with the events which Luke connects with it, illustrates:

1. The power of faith [v. 6]. Jesus often assured his disciples that there are no limits to what men may do if they have faith. Once, when they had failed to cure a frenzied boy, he told them they had failed because of unbelief, "For verily I say unto you, If ye have faith as a grain of mustard seed, ye shall say unto this mountain, Remove hence to yonder place; and it shall remove; and nothing shall be impossible unto you." Again, when they saw the fig tree which had withered at his word, he told them that with faith they could not only do what he had done, but whatever they should ask in prayer, believing [Mark 11: 22–24]. He gave a similar assurance to Jairus, asking that his daughter might be healed. In the lesson for today he told the disciples that faith would give them power to command a sycamine tree to be plucked up and planted in the sea, and it would obey them. That was an impressive way of saying, "With God all things are possible."

But what kind of faith is that which cannot fail? First, it is living faith. It is not compared to a grain of sand, but to a grain of mustard seed. It gains power by exercise. Next, it is bent on holy ends. Confidence that God will use his power to gratify our selfish desires is misplaced confidence. It involves a false estimate of the character of God. "Ye ask and receive not, because ye ask amiss." A genuine faith in God could never prompt a petition which does not seek closer likeness to him. True faith places no limit as to the time or method of God giving us what we seek or doing for others what we ask.

2. The service of faith vs. 7–10. The only kind of servant who is honorable is the faithful one. Our business is not to make God serve us. Many seem to be surprised because he does not answer their prayers, provide for their wants in the way that would please them and devote himself to their service. Perhaps it is because of a too prevalent false idea of human fatherhood that we so often misconceive our relations with our Heavenly Father. The child who has always been dependent on his father often comes to think that father owes to him whatever he wants. He expects the father to work for him, to provide for his future, to live in his life, while he regards each service he does for the father as a favor. Jesus says that we are none the less servants because we are children. It is as much our business to live for the glory of God as it is for a servant to wait on his master. If we do this it is not a reason for us to expect special favor from God. We have only done our duty. Faith is not claiming but giving service. It is that trust in the wisdom of God, that confidence in his goodness and that passionate desire for the complete establishment of his kingdom on earth which finds it sweet to give one's whole self in service to him.

3. The reward of faith [vs. 11–14]. The writer of this gospel would have us understand that while we have no claim on God for special favors, they are often granted in answer to prayer. They are not to be regarded as necessary to confirm our trust, but as evidences of the Father's love; and they must be accompanied by obedience to all his commands. Luke, therefore, here relates the incident of the ten lepers. No experience in the Holy Land is more repulsive than the common one of meeting lepers, who hang around the highways at the entrances of villages. Their diseased faces, decaying limbs and hoarse whines or whispers stir the deepest pity. Ten such met Jesus one day and begged him for relief. They had no doubt heard of his deeds of healing. They expected, probably, that he would speak the word of power and that they would be well. But instead he treated them as Elisha had treated the Syrian captain, Naaman. He told them to act as though they were healed. According to the law [Lev. 14] a leper, when cured of his disease, must go to the priest and by appropriate ceremonies be again introduced to society. Jesus said to these ten lepers, Present yourselves to the priests as cleansed men. In their act of obedience they found the blessing they had asked. Here is a suggestion for every one who desires the new life in Christ. He need not wait for tokens that his heart has been changed. Let him begin at once to obey the will of God as far as he understands it. The reward of faith is found in obedience. "The truest repentance," said Luther, "is leading a new life." Many have waited vainly for some sign that God has forgiven their sins till they have set themselves to do their daily duties as servants of God seeking to please him, and in such simple service they have found the peace they have desired.

4. The highest fruit of faith [vs. 15–19] Those who have even the smallest degree of vital confidence in God and devote their lives to serve him never fail to receive the reward of that trust. But often it does not rise to the noblest sense of communion with him for want of that filial gratitude which must find expression in thanksgiving. The temper that seeks reasons for praising God and delights in them gains his richest blessings. Only one of the ten cleansed lepers came back to Jesus to thank him. It was not necessary for them to do so. Their religious duty was discharged when they had been dismissed by the priest. The one who did come back was the last one who might have been expected to do it. He was not even a Jew, but one of the despised Samaritans. The last words spoken to him by Jesus seem simply to have confirmed the cure already wrought. But in connection with his kindly commendation, as contrasted with the conduct of the others, they could hardly have meant less than that this Samaritan had a nobler manhood and would enjoy a richer experience than the others were capable of receiving.

Faith, then, however small it be, has measureless possibilities if only it is exercised. It does not first claim favors from God, but seeks to render service to him. When it is rewarded by answers to prayer it turns to him a heart overflowing with gratitude and finds in loving him that spiritual growth which is the highest reward, the life that is continually becoming more like him.

PROGRESS OF THE KINGDOM.

A MISSIONARY'S SINE QUA NON.

BY REV. EDWARD A. LAWRENCE.*

The science of missions is one of the most fascinating and sublime of sciences, demanding the exclusive devotion of a lifetime of study and experience; and this because the foreign mission work is one of the most glorious of enterprises, at once grand enough to arouse all the enthusiasm and employ all the energies and talents of the churches of Christendom, yet plain and practicable and feasible enough to command the approval both of enlightened faith and of prudent business judgment. In treating of missions, we must distinguish between motives and the motive. When we come to the heart of the matter, there can be but one supreme comprehensive motive. This is love for Christ. Said Count Zinzendorf, "I have but one passion and that is he, only he." We go through his sending us. He is our life and the life of his church, and with him lies the secret and impulsion of all we do in his kingdom. Following out the working of this expansive force, this supreme motive, and brought thus into close contact with Christ, mouth to mouth, eyes to eyes, hands to hands, the dead soul revives, shares all the universalism of that divine life and goes forth to claim the world. In this consecration the spirit is habitually constrained by the love of Christ, judging that he died for all, that they which live no longer should live unto themselves, but unto him that died for them and rose again.

"Spiritual agents for spiritual work" is the first qualification to be laid down by every missionary organization. These words of the late Henry Venn constitute a fundamental principle in the Church Missionary Society: "We take the best men who offer themselves to us according to the standard fixed by the fathers and founders of the society—a standard confirmed by the practical experience of every year in the mission field as comprising the only qualifications which can win souls for Christ. We seek men who have so felt the constraining love of Christ as to be weaned by it from the love of the world, and to be willing to spend and be spent for him—men who know what true conversion of the soul is by personal experience, and can testify to others that they have found the pearl of great price. It is by no formula of doctrine that we judge, but by the spirit of the men." Dr. Thoburn, in his excellent missionary addresses, says, after the experience of twenty-seven years: "A genuine missionary work is prompted supremely by the constraining love of Christ. Nothing can take its place. The young man who is not thus constrained by the love of Christ to devote himself to the missionary work should never be constrained by anything else. It is not worth his while to go to the mission field. He will be disappointed if he goes, and will be a disappointment to those to whom he goes."

Everything depends on the willingness, the consecration. The call is for more men. You are one of a few to whom it can come. Are you ready to go where Christ wants you? When you hear that whispered voice saying, "Follow thou me," will you not press on, obedient to the vision? Sometimes you must even go in the very teeth of providence. Yet this may be only the testing of your purpose. There may be at this very time some who are inclined to the mission field, yet hold back from the fear that they may not be accepted. Do not be deterred by this preliminary obstacle. Pray until your inclination grows to a purpose and an enthusiasm. Commune with God until light and strength come, then offer yourself to your board. If the door is closed you have done no more than your duty, and the importunity of quenchless enthusiasm has opened heavier doors than any closed before you. The true missionary spirit, though delayed, will knock again and again. If the door remains shut, you may find or make other doors through which to pass to your true work for the kingdom of Christ.

This spirit of personal consecration to a life work can atone for the lack of almost everything else, but nothing can atone for the lack of it. He, who, cut off from the traditions of the past, from the associations of his friends, from the counsel of his brethren and fathers, is to become the founder of churches, must be sure of one possession. He must know God. If he knows him well, with that clearness of vision which comes from the pure heart and that intimacy which is the result of self-surrender, he has the key to all other knowledge and possessions. Such a consecration will fit him to be a soul-winner, a church-father, a kingdom-founder, a true missionary. Now let the consecrated man set forth. At the best he will never in himself be sufficient for these things. But, when in the work, grace may make him meet for the Master's service.

Be sure, however, that he accepts the principles of Christianity as taught by Christ and the apostles and summarily expressed in the Apostles' and the Nicene Creeds, and as developed in the harmonious and connected elements of the great Protestant creeds and writings. Far more care is needed as to any peculiarities or tendencies of belief than in the case of a pastor at home. With such a pastor any individual deficiencies or eccentricities of faith are largely discounted among those who have so many other sources of instruction. Varying peculiarities of different men and churches offset one another, often contributing to the healthy development of theology. The effect of such peculiarities in the belief of the missionary might be very unfortunate. If, however, he has proved himself sound in faith and in judgment, he can be trusted to shape the theological thought of the mission church. He must be trusted to do this. It would be most harmful to the work for a man who has begun an important enterprise to be withdrawn from it on doctrinal or any other grounds. It should be done only in the case of fundamental departure from the faith. Freedom must be the rule on the field. Therefore I would be the more concerned to have him rooted and grounded in the faith before he goes forth. Send out only the trustworthy—those who, while firm in their own convictions, will know how to work with others, recognizing and respecting differences of opinion and temperament.

A general harmony of feeling and a spirit of co-operation in work are of the first importance in the missionary field. I cannot do better than to quote here from the official private instructions of the Church Missionary Society, for they embody truths which I have seen to be most important: "Learn to cherish a wide interest in the mission to which you belong; to identify yourself in sympathy and counsel with your brethren, as well as with your own peculiar department, as not knowing whether the Lord may answer your prayers by prospering your brother's work rather than your own. Though for convenience there may be a division of labor in a mission, the utmost care must be taken that such a division does not beget an exclusive or selfish spirit, even in the work of our common Lord. This selfish spirit is not unfrequently the besetting sin of truly devoted missionaries. 'My people,' 'my catechists,' 'my schools,' are expressions which but too often grate on the ears."

THE WORLD AROUND.

Salvation Army in India Accused. Fresh trouble has come upon the Salvation Army by means of the serious charges brought by Rev. W. J. Gillespie, an Irish Presbyterian missionary in India, against Commissioner Booth-Tucker, whom he accuses of publishing statistics of converts who have no existence and reporting facts which are false in every particular. Mr. Tucker asserts that the Salvation Army probably have in Gujerat 75,000 general adherents and 10,000 genuine converts; but Mr. Gillespie, who says he has spent more years in Gujerat than Mr. Tucker has spent weeks, boldly declares that if the commissioner can produce a hundred real converts brought to a saving knowledge of Christ through the sole instrumentality of the army during the last twelve years, he will subscribe a rupee a head. The Salvation Army reports a great work among the Panch Mahals, but Rev. Mr. Thomson of the Church Missionary Society and Mr. Blair of the Irish Presbyterian Mission tried in vain to find a single Salvationist in the district, and other missionaries express suspicions founded on similar experiences in other Indian fields. Even the editor of The Bombay Guardian, Mr. A. S. Dyer, who is in strong sympathy with the army, admits that Mr. Tucker has been "a leader in exaggeration," and, though objecting to Mr. Gillespie's aggressive attitude, says that the Irish missionary is much more careful of his facts and figures than the Salvationist. It now remains to be seen whether Mr. Tucker's statements can be successfully defended, and the result of a thorough investigation will be a critical turning point for the Salvation Army.

PRAYER MEETING.

BY REV. ISAAC OGDEN RANKIN.

Topic, May 3–9. "Be of Good Cheer." John 16: 22–33.

Christ wants only volunteers in his kingdom. He never compels and he never deceives. He forewarns those who come that there is trouble in store for them, but he promises them strength to overcome. A sick man might fear to walk a mile, when if he could be made strong it would be only a pleasure. Christ will not shorten the mile, but he gives us strength to walk it easily.

We must expect to have trouble, therefore, but if we are Christ's followers and endeavorers we have a right to expect that he will help us bear it. The mistake is when we add to the troubles, which he allows to come for our help in education, other troubles which we invent or borrow. So we cheat ourselves out of the merry hours and the peaceful days which Christ intended for us. The burdens that we borrow are heavier than the cross God chooses for us, and most of the wrinkles about our eyes and mouths are of our own bringing. There is trouble enough—why not take our share instead of borrowing?

We are to be cheerful, hopeful, glad, not because the world is an easy place to live, but because Christ gives us strength to live in hard places. It is his strength and we shall never find it failing. We do not, however, get it all at once, but little by little as we have need. There never was a hard day which did not have the offer of sufficient strength from Christ. And, as the hardships grow easier to bear, the joy becomes greater. "Ye, therefore, now have sorrow; but I will see you again, and your heart shall rejoice, and your joy no man taketh from you."

Cheerfulness is sunlight for the hearts of those about us, and it never shines so brightly as when it is the reflection of the Sun of Righteousness. The gladdest and most helpful people are those who are always looking up and saying, "For thou, Lord, hast made me glad through thy work: I will triumph in the works of thy hands."

Parallel verses: Phil. 4: 13; Eph. 6: 10–18; Acts. 23: 11; 27: 22; Ps. 121.

In the life of every man there comes a day when he sees the heaven open, and it is nearly always from that moment that the true spiritual personality of a soul begins. In that moment there was formed the invisible and eternal image by which we shall be known to angels and to fellow-souls.—M. Materlinck.

BOOK REVIEWS.

FROUDE ON THE REFORMATION.

Lectures on the Council of Trent, delivered at Oxford, 1892–3. by James Anthony Froude. This last published work of the late Regius professor of modern history at Oxford formed the initial course of his brief professorship. As a posthumous publication it has not had the benefit of its author's final criticism and revision, but it is complete and shows this lack, if anywhere, in some slight repetitions entirely appropriate to spoken discourse and not out of place in dealing with the separate parts of so large and varied a subject.

The true topic of the book, indeed, is larger than the title. It is a study of the Reformation and concerns itself with the material found in the social and political rather than the purely theological conditions and struggles of the time. The council itself, which became the final determining factor of the modern Roman Catholic Church, was at first the chessboard where the game of opposing interests between pope and emperor was fought out to its conclusion, and it affords perhaps the best and most central position from which to view the whole game of the time.

Mr. Froude points out that the parties concerned in the Reformation, which we are inclined to think of as only two, were really three, the corrupt, greedy and tyrannical court of Rome and its lesser courts and centers of power in the northern lands, the protesting laity awakened by the new learning to a breadth of culture unknown to most of the clergy and determined that simony, licentiousness and oppression should cease among the priests and bishops, and the doctrinal iconoclasts and reformers to whom it was given to lay the foundations of the reformed churches. The yoke of clerical power had grown to be intolerable and the corruption of clerical life a scandal, as Mr. Froude abundantly proves out of the mouth of purely Roman Catholic witnesses. If Luther had been suppressed, another leader would have been found; but, in the author's opinion, if the papal court had been alive to the needs and opportunities of the time, and had accepted the reform of life for which the laity were clamorous, the doctrinal results of the Reformation might have been postponed or very greatly modified. Of this we are not so certain, but the argument is clearly and strongly put and we commend it to the consideration of our readers.

As to the council itself it was at first, as we have said, the subject of a game of skill between the emperor, Charles the Fifth, who was no innovator, but who had promised the reformers a council at which they should be heard, and the abuses of which they complained considered and redressed, and the Pope, who wanted no council, but, if he must have one, insisted that it should be under his own presidency and that it should consider doctrine and not the practical reforms of clerical life which the age demanded. Luther died at the critical moment, and the union of the reformers broke apart, Charles's hand was forced, the pope had his own way, and the breach was made irreparable.

A large part of the value of the book for general readers consists in its attempt at an impartial, and therefore deliberate and cool, study of a period which is too often approached both by Protestant and Roman Catholic students with controversial heat and blindness. Froude, indeed, is always an advocate, but has the advantage here of holding a brief for the intermediate or moderate party and not for either of the extremes. [Charles Scribner's Sons. $2.00.]

BIBLICAL RESEARCH.

The Jewish Scriptures, by Amos K. Fiske, is an attempt to present the results of modern critical study of Hebrew history and literature to English readers. The portion of the book which treats of the history gives the views of various members of the most extreme section of the higher critics. These results have not been accepted by the great body of scholars. There is a field for a book giving their conclusions, but it should carefully discriminate between the views of the great majority and those of the few. The latter part of the book deals with the Old Testament as literature and here the author may be fairly said to have in some degree attained the object set forth in his preface. [Charles Scribner's Sons. $1.50.]

The Quotations of the New Testament from the Old, by Dr. Franklin Johnson, treats the subject in a scholarly and exhaustive way. The author contends that all these quotations are exact and sufficient for the requirements of the place where they occur. He takes up the various cases where it has been assumed that the New Testament writers were at fault, discusses them, brings forward parallels from other literatures and justifies them. The book is well written, furnished with numerous examples and references and carefully indexed. It will take a high place in the literature on the subject. [American Baptist Publication Society. $2.00.]

In How to Study the Bible for Greatest Profit Rev. R. A. Torrey furnishes a brief and concise manual for Bible study. He rightly emphasizes the great distinction between intelligent and useful study and the aimless methods which are but too prevalent. He warns against a too great use of the imaginative faculties and lays stress upon the value of plain common sense. The book should meet with success in its own sphere. [Fleming H. Revell Co. 50 cents.]

Bible Chronology, by Rev. Smith B. Goodenow, is absolutely worthless. We would dismiss it with this simple statement but for the fact that it may seem supercilious to do so without assigning any reasons. Many of our most diligent scholars have devoted much time to the study of the chronology of the Old Testament. Some endeavor to confine themselves to the literal Hebrew text and others rely more upon records on stone and clay tablets written in the very time of the Hebrew kings. But this author asserts that some slight corruption of the Hebrew text may be possible but only in the case of a single figure, as by an even hundred [p. 315], and that he can point out all such places. He bases his attack upon the Assyrian chronology upon fragmentary quotations from George Smith. This famous Assyriologist was in the foremost ranks of the men of his time, and were he alive today he would doubtless be ranged with Dr. McCurdy and other scholars whom our author vigorously attacks. He does not scruple to change figures in the even hundreds, and to supply what he calls "italic thought words," wherever necessary to his theory. He also contradicts himself in its interests [cf. §114 with §116]. The dissertation on primeval man [p. 327ff] and the hypothesis of the creation of a physical soulless human being at noon on the "sixth day," and his extinction and the creation of the spiritual man, Adam, at the close of that day, are unworthy of serious consideration. [Fleming H. Revell Co. $2 00.]

RELIGIOUS.

Books of prayer and meditation appropriate for "the still hour" are not common, nor do they spring up naturally in the disturbed soil of our modern life. Such a book demands quiet, the repose of soul which we find it so hard to obtain for ourselves, and it must have its demand granted before it can be rightly judged. Such a book of mingled prayer, meditation and self-examination is When Thou Hast Shut Thy Door, by Amos R. Wells. In brief chapters it brings the needs and experiences of life to the test of the quiet hour of God's presence and communion. If its invitation is heeded its work will be largely done, and its suggestions will find a welcome. The author has made a valuable contribution to one of the crying needs of the church. [Fleming H. Revell Co. 60 cents.]

The Beatitudes, and other sermons by Alexander MacLaren, D. D. It is not easy to define the power of such simple and natural preaching as this, but at least we may see that a large part of it lies in its very simplicity. The meaning, being spoken, is obvious, but its application stirs our hearts. Perhaps we may apply to Dr. MacLaren a part of the statement in which he attempts to define the originality of his Master. It "lies not so much in the novelty of his precepts as in the new relation in which he sets them, the deepening which he gives them, the motives on which he bases them." Something of this originality of reverence and insight we find in this as in all the other books of Dr. MacLaren. [Macmillan & Co. $1.50 ]

Walking with God, by Samuel Bond Randall, with introduction by Henry C. Mabie, D. D. In his preface, dated at Los Gatos, Cal., the author says that his book "will have served its purpose if it helps some of the Father's children to a practical realization of the joy, usefulness and power of a life of fellowship with God." This end, in its high spirituality of tone and clear thought, it seems to us to have every prospect of serving. It is another evidence of the perennial novelty of the old gospel. [Fleming H. Revell Co. 60 cents.]

Daily Thoughts from Phillips Brooks is a little volume of selections for every day in the year, prefaced by Dean Farrar's appreciative estimate and tribute reprinted by permission from the Review of Reviews. The selection seems to be very well made for the end in view. [R. H. Woodward & Co. 75 cents.]

POETRY.

Songs of Day and Night, by Frank W. Gunsaulus. This new volume of poems by Dr. Gunsaulus includes many which were written for special occasions, yet the book ranges through a wide field. Nature and literature have afforded suggestions which the author meets with a responsive soul. It is not to be expected that the busy pastor of a large city church can have that leisure without which the greatest poetic achievement is impossible, but there is an appreciation of art qualities and necessities which perhaps finds its best expression in the Two Transmigrations, the long poem blank verse with which the book con-des. [A. C. McClurg & Co. $1.50.]

tev. Ernest Warburton Shurtleff, pas-of the Church of the Pilgrims in mouth, Mass, has published three ser-aven*, and Heaven in Easter, we have

Arlo Bates has given us in the Athenæum ss series a new edition of Poems by n Keats, with an introduction biographi-and appreciative, which is wisely critical l informing. We like the selection and angement of the poems, especially for

STORIES.

Those who enjoy Scotch dialect will find lever picture of Highland life and char-er in the story of James Inwick, Plough-n and Elder, by P. Hay Hunter. The acious love of the Scotch for their kirk, ir shrewd sense and dry humor are well ought out in the character of Inwick, who, virtue of his position as elder, is a man strong influence among his fellows. He a Liberal in politics and flounders sadly, rtly, however, on account of a trick ayed upon him in connection with the ssage of a disestablishment bill through rliament. His struggle to be loyal to the k and yet true to his party ends in fail-e and brings upon him a flood of caustic proaches and the alienation of his friends.
racy and typical passage is one in which speculates on the political degeneracy of chie Howden: "He had juist ae faut—a y bad ane, I maun alloo: he was a maist emenjis Tory." This is accounted for on e ground that he is "a maist notor'ous ader o' the papers. He was like the fule the buik o' Proverbs—his een were in the ds o' the yirth; an' no' to be a man o' ddication, the way he rappit aff a' thae ng-nebbit names o' faur-away places an' em folk wadna ha' shamed the dominie msel." [Harper & Bros. $1.00.]
Mr. Anthony Hope's clever dialogue and wer of comic and dramatic situation ap-ars to good advantage in Comedies of urtship. The author, we are told, has andoned the short story in favor of the vel and the drama, whether entirely to e world's gain may be doubted. He uld probably be the last to wish to have seriously argue in regard to his own ew of life from these amusing and often ivolous and cynical stories, but no one who reads them as pure farce comedy will fail to get genuine amusement from them. [Charles Scribner's Sons. $1.50.]

A Fool of Nature, by Julian Hawthorne. Family pride and the artistic and literary ambitions of the new woman have their part in this story. We are aware that it was very hastily written in competition for a prize, and that the prize was awarded to it. Knowing these facts we can only wonder what the other stories in competition can have been. It has a fairly good plot, spoiled in the elaboration, and it painfully illustrates what has always seemed to us a capital lack in Mr. Hawthorne's literary equipment—the absence of a genuine sense of humor. Nine out of ten readers, we fear, encountering the absurd and wearisome names of the people in the book, would lay it down in disgust. One such name might be amusing, but a whole company of them has no fit place out of Bedlam. [Charles Scribner's Sons. $1.25.]

A second prize story from the same competition is Your Money or Your Life, by Edith Carpenter. It is rather a crude and melodramatic book, but clever and interesting and carrying the wholesome moral that the life is more than meat, which the play upon the words of the title (at one end referring to the exacting demands of business and at the other to a train robbery in which the hero becomes mixed up) serves to emphasize. There is a second moral, which runs to the effect that train robbery and murder are quite excusable if only the robber is brave and gentlemanly, but this will only be drawn by those who are unable to distinguish farce from earnest. [Charles Scribner's Sons. $1 25.]

Mrs. Romney is one of Miss Rosa Nou chette Carey's agreeable stories. Its moral is distinct enough, but is not obtruded, and we shall leave our readers to discover for themselves what it is by the pleasant paths of the story. [J. B, Lippincott Co. $1 00.]

MISCELLANEOUS.

Prof. Enrico Ferri's book on Criminal Sociology is full of interesting material for the student of penology as well as of general anthropology. He divides "the social strata into three analogous categories—the highest, which commits no crimes"; the lowest, which "is made up of individuals opposed to all sense of uprightness, who, being without education, are perpetually dragged back by their material and moral destitution into the primitive forms of the brute struggle for existence, inherit from their parents and transmit to their children an abnormal organization, adding degeneration and disease"; and, lastly, those "who are not born to crime, but are not firmly upright, alternating between vice and virtue, with imperfect moral sense, education and training, for whom punishment may be genuinely useful as a psychological motive." America's contribution toward the solution of the problems of punishment (at Elmira) is referred to with appreciation. The growth of crime with the coming of the wine harvest is suggestive, as are the remarks [p. 116] upon the increasing gravity of the question of drunkenness in Italy. Our readers will find the conclusions and remedies of the modern school of penologists clearly and fully stated in the concluding chapter, and we commend them to their study. So valuable and comprehensive a book should not have been sent out without an index. [D. Appleton & Co. $1.50.]

Max Müller in his Three Lectures on the Science of Language gives a clear exposition of his theory of language. As in his other works, he insists upon its entirely human origin and proposes it as the best basis for classifying mankind. He adds a dissertation on the identity of thought and language and gives a historical sketch of that theory. The book is simply and plainly written, but it must be remembered that Müller is the leader of a school and that his conclusions are far from being accepted by all his fellow-students. [Open Court Publishing Co. 75 cents.]

The Bicyclers and Three Other Farces, by John Kendrick Bangs. The material for amusement in these farces is derived from the experience of a novice with the bicycle, an attempt at amateur theatricals in a private house, and the embarrassment of a young man proposing to a young lady in the presence of a rival. The book is bright and amusing. [Harper & Bros. $1.25.]

It is an interesting experiment which James Baldwin has tried in Old Stories of the East. It is an attempt to tell the stories of the Hebrew Scriptures in simple modern language, for the purpose of making a school reading-book of them. As an example of the wholesome modern tendency to study the Bible as literature the book is interesting. The minimizing of the religious element was perhaps inevitable from the author's point of view, but in our judgment it is carried altogether too far. [American Book Co. 45 cents.]

NOTES.

—— How Marcus Whitman Saved Oregon has passed into a fifth edition.

—— An edition of Eugene Field's Love Affairs of a Bibliomaniac is soon to be published in London.

—— Concord, Mass , has recently in town meeting appointed a committee to prepare for a statue of Emerson.

—— The new Chicago Theological Seminary Press begins its work by the publication of The Students' Life of Jesus, by Professor Gilbert.

—— Clinton Scollard has resigned the chair of English literature at Hamilton College in order to give his whole time to literary work.

—— The Julius Hallgarten prizes for the year at the New York National Academy of Design have been awarded to Miss Mary Brewster Houghton of Boston, T. H. Hatfield of Canton Junction, Mass., and Miss Louise Cox—two women and one man.

—— North Adams, Mass., is to be congratulated upon its splendid gift of property for a free library, reading and historical rooms from its mayor, Albert C. Houghton, who offers it as a memorial of his late brother, Andrew Jackson Houghton of Boston.

—— It is stated that many of the editorials in the London Daily News favorable to the North in the time of the Civil War were written by Harriet Martineau. This was a service worthy to be placed alongside of that of the American, Harriet Beecher Stowe.

—— A breakfast in celebration of the fiftieth anniversary of the ordination of Dr. Alexander MacLaren is to be given him by his ministerial brethren in London, April 28. A picture of Dr. MacLaren is at the same time to be presented to the new Manchester City Hall.

—— George Walter Vincent Smith has opened and presented to the city of Springfield, Mass., an art museum containing a collection, largely from Oriental sources, which it has been the occupation of his life to gather. Building and art treasures alike will perpetuate his name and service to generation after generation as no mere monument could do.

—— The much talked about Yale course on the modern novel has been abandoned. It proved to be popular—too popular it was thought, and it had been so much discussed in the papers that the authorities apparently disliked the notoriety of it. Professor Phelps himself, we believe, has not been satisfied with the success of the experiment, and took the initiative in discontinuing it.

—— Mr. Tait, a New York publisher, writes to the New York Evening Post on the subject of foreign and American writers. Among the causes working in favor of the foreigner he refers to the competition of the cheap magazines, the sensationalism of the daily press and its condemnation of sensationalism in books, the adoration of the foreign writer, and, as a result of all these conditions, the preference of the publisher for the foreign article which it is so much easier and more profitable to handle.

Rev. Alexander McKenzie, D. D., President; George Gould, Treasurer.

PASSING COMMENT.

Fifty-year pastorates are infrequent anywhere, but that one should be celebrated in the West adds particular interest to the event. This pastor is one of the few surviving members of that inspired company of twelve young men who "settled the question that Congregationalism was to become a power in Iowa." But through the door which they opened a mighty influence swept, not only through one State but into the wide West.

The type of foreigner which was represented by one of the addresses at the Arizona meeting is a hint as to what innovations a longer period of home missionary work may bring about in our church gatherings.

"It is hand to hand work that tells"—this was the seed thought which developed into the most effective awakening to religious obligations that was ever known in a Maine town.

Church unity is of prime importance among local churches of the same denomination as among those of different creeds. Several instances of the amicable union of pairs of churches of late tend to show that this spirit is present on some of our fields. An illustration comes from the Pacific coast this week.

On the other hand, in a few instances, marked advance on the road to ultimate interdenominational unity is suggested by items from the Eastern and Interior sections.

FROM MONTANA.

Helena has recently had an experience almost unique in its history. The six leading and several smaller evangelical churches united for evangelistic meetings under the lead of Rev. J. H. Elliott and Mr. Butts. Preparations were begun in January by a workers conference of two days, and the union services were under good headway when the leaders reached the city. For three weeks nearly every night the auditorium was crowded. The interest grew and large numbers confessed Christ, while Christians also were roused. The children's meetings were unusually successful, at one the largest meeting house in the city being crowded. The enthusiasm which all the churches displayed compelled people to think for themselves, and when over 100 of the leading business firms closed one afternoon for the benefit of the meetings people asked, "Is this Helena?" The masses gladly heard the message and the city will welcome another such visit.

Reform movements are no more popular in Helena than elsewhere. Gambling houses are well patronized and the State law against gambling has been overthrown. Beer halls are thronged nightly and an ordinance prohibiting the employment of female musicians in such places was repealed as soon as its enforcement was tried. The influence of the ministers is more feared than that of gamblers. At a recent election of school trustees the announcement that the majority of the ministers favored a certain ticket drove Jew and Gentile, Catholic and Unitarian to the polls that the city might not be given over to the schemes of the ministers.

But the influence of the churches is growing and its continuance is certain. The Congregational churches in Montana are in good condition. The only self-supporting church, that in Helena, has just paid off its debt and is rejoicing over the prospect of larger work. The home missionary churches feel keenly the reduced appropriations for the year, $1,100 less than was estimated would be necessary. Billings rejoices that its pastor, Rev. P. B. Jackson, has decided to remain. C. K.

THE NORTH TEXAN ASSOCIATION.

Strawberries and roses in Cleburne welcomed the association, April 7, 8, some of whose members came hundreds of miles over extensive deep green prairies, with matchless soil supporting everything from oranges on the gulf to cotton and wheat on the north. "Lone Star" seemed inappropriate for such a State.

The ministers and delegates, including judges, bankers and business men, are solid, earnest men who expect results. They are all overflowing with Methodist interjections. The scholarly pastor, the blacksmith, who was ordained, the railroad man, who was licensed, and the Salvation Army soldiers, all have been blessed in the work here, representing street preaching, missions and revivals in the churches.

Rev. C. I. Scofield, the former superintendent and pastor in Dallas, was often affectionately mentioned. Rev. W. E. Reed succeeds him in the church, finding a happy, united band with a flourishing branch, of which Rev. W. I. Carroll is pastor, and a street work which is most fruitful. The new home missionary superintendent is Rev. Luther Rees, the pastor in Paris, whose church has just given $1,300 to foreign missions and has four mission stations. He looks upon Texas as naturally Congregational, and many places are calling for him. Waco in the center of the State, with forty or fifty members, needs aid at once, but there are not funds even for a start.

The discussions of the association were all practical, for example, Christian Endeavor Efficiency, Giving to Aid the Christian Life, Partnership with God. Rev. G. A. Hood of the C. C. B. S. was the only representative present from the East. H.

THE ARIZONA STATE MEETING.

For the people of this semi-arid region, who continually look on plains nearly barren and scantily-wooded mountains, Tempe, located in the fertile, well-watered Salt River Valley, with its luxuriant growth of alfalfa trees and flowers, proved an ideal spot for the meeting.

Distances here being so great that we consider ourselves fortunate to see each other's faces once a year, the fellowship of the annual gathering is highly prized. There are but four churches in the body, and the three sending representatives to Tempe required an average of 170 miles of traveling for the delegates. But the churches were all represented by pastor and one to four delegates. The meeting was held April 7–9.

A high ideal was set for the ministry in the opening paper, by Rev. J. H. Heald, on The Spiritual Life of the Minister. This was followed by The Spiritual Life of the Church, ably presented by Hon. H. Bushman, mayor of Tucson. One session was occupied with these missionary topics: The Work of Evangelization Among the Mexicans, by Rev. S. Edwards; Chinese Work in This Country, by T. W. Otis; The Bearing of Chinese Work Here on Missions in China, by Jan Wan; and The Missionary Spirit, by Rev. E. H. Ashmun. It was specially interesting to have a paper by a Chinaman who is the first fruits of the Prescott China School. He gave a good address, showing how the conversion of the Chinese in this country is to accomplish the evangelization of their native land. The two races considered in these papers appeal to us strongly in this territory, yet little work is being done for either.

The sermon by Rev. L. A. Pettibone was full of a quiet force due to the exalted thought and the earnestness of the speaker. The history of our denominational work from the beginning to the present time was given by Rev. T. D. McLean. It proved so satisfactory that he was continued in the capacity of historian.

The reports from the churches were more than usually gratifying. They are all in good condition and show commendable growth. In The Strength and the Weakness of Christian Endeavor, Miss Ella Taylor pointed out some of the dangers before our young people as well as the elements of strength in that movement. An afternoon session was made of stirring interest and genuine value in the discussion of Man's Place in the Church, by Mrs. J. H. Heald, and Why Not More Men in the Church, by Rev. C. L. Kloss and E. M. Ficket.

The examination of Mrs. J. H. Heald for ordination was altogether satisfactory, revealing unexpected strength in one without special theological training. The ordaining prayer was offered by Rev. Daniel Kloss and the charge given by Superintendent Ashmun.

If there was one controlling idea in the sessions it was the holding up of Christ as essential to the human soul. From the first paper to the closing addresses on Christ the Supreme Need of Man this thought seemed to prevail.

THEOLOGICAL SEMINARIES.

Bangor.

The fourth, fifth and sixth Bond Lectures were given last week on The Existing Social Order, Social Problems to Be Met by the Minister, and Some Natural Checks on the Evils of Competition. ——The Seniors held their class supper last Wednesday evening. The post-prandial exercises consisted of an entertaining paper by the class historian, Mr. H. E. Lombard, and concluded with singing the class song, composed by Mr. W. H. Dunnak.—— Mr. Gales accepts a call to Union, Me.

Andover.

Recent preachers in the seminary church have been Rev. H. P. Dewey of Concord, N. H., and President Lee of the French College, Springfield.——Mr. A. L. Ripley gave an address on Some Financial Heresies last Friday.——Rev. Henry Blodget, D. D., Hyde lecturer on foreign missions, has begun a series of 10 lectures on the Mission Field in China. ——Mr. G. M. Ward of the Senior Class has been called to the presidency of Washburn College and also to that of Rollins College. His decision is not made.——Rev. Andrew Mulnix of last year's class visited the seminary lately and gave a glowing account of home mission work in South Dakota.—— Rev. W. W. Ranney was here last week to secure recruits for the "Maine Band."——Owing to the recent illness of Captain King the seminary ball team has been disbanded and the entire amount in the treasury given to the Armenian relief fund.

Hartford.

At the missionary meeting last Wednesday afternoon Dr. A. P. Foster spoke on the Missionary Sunday School Work in the country, with special reference to the work of the Am. S. S. Union.—— The Hartford Union Association has approbated H. W. Dunning, J. E. Merrill and G. H. Post of the Senior Class to preach. From the Middle Class E. W. Bishop has been approbated by the New London Association, and F. W. Hazen and W. Hazen by the Middlesex Association.

Yale.

Prof. Samuel Harris, who, since his resignation of the chair of systematic theology, has taught the Junior Class in philosophy, will not continue next year. Professor Stevens will assume that work in September.——The missionary society was addressed last week by Rev. J. K. Browne of Harpoot.—— At the public meeting of the Leonard Bacon Club the question, Resolved, That the college course should be reduced from four to three years, was discussed by Messrs. Rowe, Evers, Rondenbush and Clark.——Among the special lectures last week was one by Professor Weir of the art school on A Glimpse of Holland in the Time of Rembrandt, and one before the Philosophical Club on The Will to Believe, by Prof. William James of Harvard.—— Additional names of those approbated to preach are Messrs. John Deans, Jr., and E. H. Eppens of the Senior Class.

CONFERENCES AND ASSOCIATIONS.

MASS.—The spring meeting of Hampton County Conference was held in Chester, April 22. The general theme was The Church at Work. The sermon on Religion in Common Life was by Rev. J. H. Lockwood; other topics were: Some Things About the Church and the Kingdom, The Church Pervading Community Life, Society, Education, Politics, The Individual the Unit of Community Life, The Opportunity of Today.

O.—A Congregational-Christian conference was held at Piqua, April 14, 15. The topics were: Are Christians Congregationalists? and Are Congregationalists Christians? How Can We Help Each Other? The Essentials of Christianity, Converging Lines, Unity the Product of Life and Condition of Earth, Gains of Unity in the Nineteenth Century and in the Twentieth Century. The sermons were preached by Rev. Messrs. Washington Gladden, D. D., and C. J. Jones.

Marietta Conference met in Belpre, April 14, 15. The topics were: The Sunday School, Organized Work for the Young, Individual Work, Missions and Congregationalism in Southern Ohio. The sermon was by Rev. C. B. Shear.

Toledo Conference met in Toledo, April 14, 15. Missionary addresses, two sermons, a paper on the word "Atonement" and an address on The Centennial Year of Congregationalism in Ohio occupied the time.

MICH.—Grand Rapids Association met in Middleville, April 13, 14, and enjoyed one of the best meetings it ever held. A large attendance, encouraging reports and a general increase of membership were noteworthy features. The association has just reached its 50th birthday.

IO.—The Sioux Association held its annual meeting at Primghar, April 14, 15. This being the home missionary ground of the State, much time was given to that subject, Secretary Douglass making the principal address. Rev. C. A. Towle of the Sunday School Society and Miss Mary P. Wright of Turkey also had sympathetic hearing. Rev. W. G. Johnston preached the sermon. One feature of the meeting was a laymen's session, in which brethren discussed: The Finances of the Church, Reform in Funeral Customs, Church Attendance, The Prayer Meeting, Church Music, and What I Like in the Pulpit. The themes presented by pastors were: The Pastor in the Homes, The Pulpit and Current Fads, and Pulpit and Pew. Addresses were also made on Temperance and Christian Citizenship.

KAN.—The Eastern Association held its spring meeting in Tonganoxie, April 7–9, with good attendance. The reports were full of inspiration. All branches of church work seem to be in a prosperous condition.

Southern Association met at Parsons, March 24–26. Rev. A. O. Penniman preached. The topics were: What May the Church Expect from the Prayer Meeting, Elements of Church Efficiency, The Y. P. S. C. E., Our Associational Meetings, and Southern Kansas Academy. Reports from the churches showed decided growth.

Northwestern Association met at Kirwin, March 31–April 2, and was an occasion of marked interest. Addresses were made upon the work and needs of four of the benevolent societies and the A. B. C. F. M. and other topics were: Stockton Academy, Washburn College, The Y. P. S. C. E., Woman's Missionary Work, Division of Labor Between Pastor and People, What Can Be Done for Pastorless Churches? and The Need of Religious Newspapers in the Home.

WN.—The Eastern Washington and Northern Idaho Association met, April 7–9, with the Walla Walla Church, the oldest and most historic in the State. Rev. W. C. Fowler preached the sermon. Reports showed that six churches had been organized and six buildings erected during the year. Stirring words were spoken by representatives of the great missionary societies, Pacific Seminary and Whitman College, an entire evening being devoted to the last named. Among other topics relating to effective and progressive Christian work were: The Young Men's Club, The Institutional Church, The Junior Endeavor Society, Demand for an Educated Ministry, Lack of Adaptation of Present Seminary Methods, How to Get Church Members to Work, How to Reach Men Who are Unbelievers. Many improved the opportunity to visit Whitman College and the historic spot where Marcus and Mrs. Whitman were massacred. It was decided to organize three bodies within the bounds of the association, the Walla Walla, Palouse and Spokane Conferences. An application was presented from the citizens of Colville to establish an academy at that place, and a committee was appointed to aid in such a movement and to commend it to the Education Society.

CLUBS.

WIS.—The Milwaukee Club held a meeting April 10. The subjects were: The Congregational Idea and Our Obligations to It, The Wisconsin Home Missionary Society, and Men with Missionary Zeal.

NEW ENGLAND.

Massachusetts.

SOMERVILLE.—Broadway. The edifice was dedicated April 16, although parts of the building were erected twelve years ago. The fact that the house had not previously been entirely paid for delayed its consecration. The remodeled auditorium will seat 870 persons, and the added seats of the neighboring rooms will accommodate 200 more. The cost of the new addition was $25,000. Dr. S. H. Virgin of New York preached the sermon. Rev. H. H. Leavitt, the pastor offered the prayer.

REVERE.—Rev. S. P. Cook, having closed a temporary period of instruction at the Lay College, suitable resolutions were passed by the students appreciative of his labors and expressing gratitude for his helpful service.——Mr. and Mrs. P. C. Butterfield, formerly students at the college, are engaged by the Bible Society of Connecticut to canvass towns in that State, distributing and selling Bibles and tracts and holding meetings as occasions offer.

PEABODY.—South. Rev. G. A. Hall preached his 10th anniversary sermon to a large congregation, April 12. During this period 176 persons had been admitted to membership, which numbers at present 325. Over $16,500 have been contributed to missions, the Sunday school has grown to a membership of 425 and all the branches of work were shown to be in a flourishing condition. An enthusiastic reception was given the pastor and his wife, April 14, the congregation and community generally being well represented. The president of the Brotherhood of Andrew and Philip presented Mr. Hall with a check of $300 as a token of the esteem in which he is held by the entire parish.

LOWELL.—First. The special legislation asked for by the majority of the church to compel the society to receive into membership church members with certain qualifications has been granted by the legislature. The vote in the House was 76 to 46 and in the Senate 17 to 9.

SPRINGFIELD.—Nearly all the pulpits of the city were filled on a recent Sunday by members of the New England Methodist Conference, then in session.——First. Last Sunday evening the pastor, Rev. F. L. Goodspeed, preached the last of a series of sermons to young people on The Art of Making Others Happy. A series of Monday afternoon organ recitals by Prof. J. H. Loud, the new organist and choir director, is now in progress. The last general social of the season was held Monday evening, April 13, and was well attended. The Bible class of Mrs. J. L. Johnson, composed of young business men, closed the social season, April 15, with an entertainment and social.——South. The Sunday afternoon vesper services are proving popular and attractive. An excellent musical program is rendered by organ and choir and the address is short.——Park. Rev. A. E. Cress, the new pastor, will begin his duties May 17. Rev. E. H. Knight has been supplying the pulpit for several months.

The ministers of all denominations of Hampden and Hampshire Counties met recently at the South meeting house to confer on the subject of Christian Unity. A report, prepared by a committee representing five denominations, was unanimously adopted. It embodied a resolve to promote unity, a willingness to consider declarations of other bodies on this subject and a proposition for the immediate forming of a union to meet annually and to be composed of representatives of every Christian congregation in these counties. Affiliation with the League of Catholic Unity was recommended on this basis.

Maine.

SANFORD.—Never has such a revival of church attendance spread amongst this people. Men of wealth and good social influence attend the services as do also men who have lost character. Such conditions have resulted from many personal visitations by the pastor, Rev. C. L. Woodworth, Jr., within a few weeks on non church-going men.

SOUTH PARIS.—On Easter Sunday 21 persons were received to membership, all on confession. During the present pastorate of three and a half years 56 have been welcomed to fellowship, 47 on confession. A deep spiritual interest prevails and the prayer meetings are well attended. The pastor is Rev. R. J. Haughton.

CUMBERLAND MILLS.—The annual parish reports show a commendable condition. All current expenses have been met, painting and repairs to the extent of over $400 provided for and $156 have been paid on the debt. The women raised $345.

ISLAND FALLS.—Whittier. A new bell weighing 800 pounds has been placed in the meeting house tower as a gift of Capt. George Carver of New York. It is inscribed in memory of his mother.

Secretary Hatch of the Maine Missionary Society gives a few facts regarding the work of the quarter ending March 1. Fifty-seven pastors have ministered to 50 churches for 13 weeks in places where otherwise there would have been little or no opportunity for religious services. There have been at least 80 hopeful conversions and these scattered missionary churches have contributed the sum of $520 to the various societies of the home and foreign field. Much faithful pastoral work has been done and in a few cases marked revivals have occurred.

New Hampshire.

AMHERST.—On Easter Sunday occurred the unveiling of a beautiful bronze tablet, as a memorial of the late Rev. J. G. Davis, D. D., for 35 years the faithful pastor of the church. An appropriate address was given by the present pastor, Rev. A. J. McGown. The tablet cost $375, and was contributed by the many that still hold the venerated pastor in loving remembrance. The finances of the society, as shown by the secretary's report, are in excellent condition. At their late meeting $1,450 were voted for the current year.

CONCORD.—South. A new chapel to cost $12,500 is to be erected, with provision for committee rooms, library and other departments.

FARMINGTON.—Evangelist Jordan has closed a profitable period of work lasting four weeks. The Baptists united in the effort.

HOLLIS.—Rev. S. L. Gerould preached his 10th anniversary sermon last week. Revival services have just been started.

Vermont.

RUTLAND.—A neat pamphlet containing the annual statements show the membership to be 785, a gain of 42 last year. The offerings and contributions for benevolences amounted to $2,091, the current expenses $5,336.

MORRISVILLE.—The building committee has been instructed to proceed at once with the erection of the proposed new house on the present site.

Connecticut.

NEW HAVEN.—A helpful feature of church life in the city is the system of adult Sunday school classes, where Bible study is pursued according to modern critical methods of interpretation Such classes have been taught the past winter for United Church by Prof. G. B. Stevens and Mr. H. T. Fowler; for Center Church by Prof. E. L. Curtis and Dr. Arthur Fairbanks; and for Dwight Place Church by the assistant pastor, Rev. C. A. Osborne.——On Tuesday of last week the branch of the Woman's Board was addressed at Center Church chapel by Miss Lizzie S. Webb of Adana, Turkey.——United. A course of lectures is being given by Miss Maria Parloa on Domestic Economy, under the auspices of the Mission Circle. The recent annual collection for the endowment fund amounts to $500. Dr. Munger has been obliged to take a rest for several weeks, and the church is in charge of the new assistant pastor, Mr. Frederick Lynch.——Howard Avenue. At the April communion additions were received to membership. The Sunday morning congregations are larger than ever.

NEW BRITAIN.—First. The church celebrated its 139th anniversary last Sunday. The pastor, Rev. G. W. Sandwell, D. D., preached an interesting historical sermon to a large congregation. At the start there were 68 members. In all 2,367 persons have been taken into fellowship. The church has had 15 pastors and three houses of worship, and has sent many persons into the ministry and mission field. A daughter, the South Church, has grown up by its side, fairly eclipsing its mother. Next Sunday Dr. Sandwell will speak on the special characteristics of his predecessors.—South. The new organ is now practically completed and will probably be used for the first time May 3, the services on that occasion taking the form of a jubilee.

IVORYTON.—Rev. L. S. Griggs, whose recent illness has been recorded, is absent on a vacation of some duration to recover his strength. There will be one preaching service in the chapel each Sunday during his absence, alternating with the services at Colebrook.

WESTBROOK.—The hill and grounds about the church were graded and many improvements made last week, the majority of the male members of the congregation doing the work.

WINDSOR LOCKS.—The benevolences last year were $2,153, and the expenses of the society $2,039. The membership is about 150. Rev. Richard Wright is pastor.

BRIDGEPORT.—The Armenian fund, which a local newspaper is managing, has received substantial support from the Park Street Church in a contribution of $100.

MIDDLE STATES.

New York.

OLEAN.—This church was much encouraged by Easter additions and was a good deal awakened by a week of meetings preceding the communion Sunday, in which neighboring pastors, Congregational and Presbyterian, preached. The church has had a hard financial struggle, but exhibits unity and consecration. Rev. J. H. McKee is the pastor.

WEST BLOOMFIELD.—This church has completed the improvements of the past two years by lighting the meeting house with a new chandelier having a 72-inch reflector. Part of the service of Easter evening was devoted to the dedication. The chandelier is largely the gift of the young women. Rev. N. W. Bates is pastor.

LAKEWOOD.—The new church edifice is rapidly approaching completion. The pastor, Rev. J. H. Barnett, supplies here and at Ashville five miles away. His home parish is situated on the beautiful Chautauqua Lake, and it is largely through the generosity of visiting friends that this meeting house is built.

NEWARK VALLEY.—Rev. M. R. Kerr occupied the pulpit April 5, as a candidate for the position made vacant by the resignation of Rev. J. S. Ellsworth. Mr. Kerr is not a stranger here, having been formerly principal of the village school.

MAINE.—Rev. Mr. Salter of a mission school in New York city spoke here recently before the united Sunday schools of the three churches. The Congregational school has for several years sent vegetables to this mission.

JAMESTOWN.—Rev. A. L. Smalley, the new pastor, is meeting with encouragement in his work, and has already won strong support from his people.

New Jersey.

ELIZABETH.—The church is making a vigorous effort to pay its debt of $1,100. All but $250 has been subscribed and considerable money paid in. The Junior Endeavor Society, of which the pastor's wife is superintendent, contributes $15 annually toward the education of a native child in India, from whom personal communications are received. The society recently sent a box to Florida containing clothing, material for a sewing school, stories, magazines, etc. It also sent scrap-books, dolls and stories to the Elizabeth General Hospital, and has contributed $10 toward the church treasury. The pastor, Rev. C. C. Clark, preaches once a month to the young Endeavorers.

THE INTERIOR.

Ohio.

CLEVELAND.—At the March Ministers' Meeting Rev. H. O. Allen read a scholarly review of Dr. Gordon's Christ of Today, and Rev. E. A. Paddock spoke upon Frontier Home Missionary Work.——East Madison Avenue, Rev. D. T. Thomas, pastor, has received more members the past year than in any year of its history. The audience-room has recently been redecorated and recarpeted, and in 20 minutes at a recent Sunday morning service the people raised $600 to clear a floating debt of some years' standing. This church makes a large contribution to home missionary work by giving the use of its commodious building to the Bohemian Board for the services of its East Madison Avenue Station. ——Lakeview Church has received eight Italians into its membership on confession, as first fruits of its Italian work under Mr. G. V. Zottarelli, an Oberlin student. Rev. A. B. Cristy has edited and published under the title, Cleveland Congregationalists, a cloth bound volume containing a history and directory of each of the 25 churches in Cleveland, and historical sketches of all Congregational organizations in the city. The book is illustrated with half-tone cuts of all the church buildings and ministers and the officers of various societies. It contains also much general denominational information. The proceeds are for the building fund of Lakeview Church.

Michigan.

Hopeful revivals have been held in Trout Creek with 22 accessions, Calumet with 57 new members and Benton Harbor with 40 Also at Greenville, Lake Linden and Vicksburg there have been encouraging signs in the work.

Wisconsin.

The Iron River church reports a better condition than ever.——Union Grove, recently visited by Rev. J. N. Lippard, has been greatly strengthened by a number of conversions.——Evangelist Norris has conducted services in Burlington with good results.——The Bayfield meeting house was burned last month, but the people will rebuild.

THE WEST.

Iowa.

LARCHWOOD.—Much interest attaches to the history of this church in the northwestern section of the State. Not many years ago a gentleman from England purchased 20,000 acres of land in this region, intending to establish something like the tenant system of the old country, and to build up an English Church in his new town. But after a while sons of former acquaintances ceased to come from England, and under the influence of the American spirit neither the tenant system nor the liturgical element in the church remained popular. Wise enough to see this, the proprietor cut up his land into farms and sold them to industrious men, and then permitted the settlers to decide upon the kind of church they would have. Though there was not a Congregationalist in the place it was unanimously decided to organize in the Congregational way, in which these professing Christians have walked happily and usefully for more than a decade. The church is well known for its aggressive spirit and for the wisdom with which it presses out to occupy new territory.

BURLINGTON.—The 50th anniversary of the settlement of the venerable pastor, Rev. William Salter, D. D., was celebrated April 12, 13. Dr. Salter, now 75 years of age, is one of the members of the famous Iowa Band, which came to this State in 1843. Two other members of the band were present, Rev. Messrs. Ephraim Adams and Alden B. Robbins. Dr. Salter preached the anniversary sermon with much of his former vigor. Addresses by pioneer preachers, the reading of original poems by Rev. W. H. Buss and others, historical reminiscences, greetings and testimonials from the citizens of Burlington and friends far and near, with a reception tendered by the women of the congregation, were features of the joyful occasion.

ELDON.—Another pastor's wife, Mrs. Eva K. Miller, has been ordained to the ministry. As an evangelist of the W. C. T. U. she has had considerable experience. Her purpose in seeking ordination is that she may be able to render more efficient assistance to her husband in his work.

COLLEGE SPRINGS.—Rev. H. C. Rosenberger has closed a successful series of meetings which have greatly strengthened the church. A number have been added to the membership and more are expected. Mr. Rosenberger has received a call to the pastorate.

DES MOINES.—Pilgrim. On Easter the attendance at morning service and also at Sunday school was the largest in the history of the church. Seven persons were welcomed to fellowship.

WHITING.—At the close of special meetings conducted by the pastor, Rev. G. H. Croker, assisted by Rev. J. M. McNamara, 85 persons were received to membership, 75 on confession.

PETERSON.—Twenty persons were received to membership Easter Sunday. The pastor and family are now occupying a newly purchased parsonage.

Imitating the example of Eastern institutions, the students of Iowa College this year have employed their spring vacation in Christian work in needy fields, going out in bands. One of these companies went to the young church at Carnforth, holding evening services and calling at the homes during the day Another visited a neglected rural district and held evening meetings in the schoolhouse. Glowing reports have been brought back of the joy of this service and of the good apparently accomplished. For a long time students have been engaged in Sunday school work in the vicinity of Grinnell with good results.

The last winter has been marked by a good deal of religious interest. To several churches more than 100 persons have been added, most of them on confession. In most cases the extra meetings have been conducted by the pastors with such assistance as neighboring ministers could render. The spring meetings are anticipated with great interest.

Minnesota.

NORTH BRANCH.—Rev. E. E. Rogers of Chowen assisted in revival work at two points on this field with excellent results. He also secured funds from friends in the East for the purchase of a much needed conveyance for the pastor, P. H. Fisk.

CLARISSA.—A new church of 19 members was organized and recognized by council April 8, the result of evangelistic services held by Rev. C. B. Fellows.

Kansas.

RUSSELL SPRINGS.—This church accomplished good while enough people remained in Logan County to make it desirable to maintain it. Its last, and by no means least, beneficent work was to distribute, with much discrimination and wisdom, more than a car load of relief goods in the winter of 1894–5 among the destitute in Logan County. These goods were sent by friends in eastern Kansas, and the clerk of Russell Springs Congregational Church was put in charge of them by the superintendent of missions. The membership now having become so reduced that services cannot be maintained, the church has given its communion service to the new and vigorous South Bend church, which was organized and is served by Rev. L. C. Schnacke of Great Bend.

SALINA.—Plymouth observed its eighth anniversary April 3–5. A reunion, social and supper were the features of the first evening, and on the second evening addresses were made on Congregationalism in various relations, Rev. W. B. Mucklow, former pastor of the church, presiding. On Sunday four persons were received to membership. The occasion was of interest throughout. The church has always been self-supporting, owns property that cost $11,000, has nearly 200 members and is united and growing. The financial stress has made it difficult for some members to pay their installments on subscriptions for the church building, but the payments are being made, and otherwise the church is practically out of debt. Rev. T. V. Davies is pastor.

KANSAS CITY.—Bethel. Mr. E. P. Mills, who has long been identified with this church, is giving it pastoral care for two months. Active cottage meetings are sustained by the members. The average attendance at each of the Sunday schools, at Bethel Mission Hall and Armourdale, falls but little below 100.——Pilgrim. In anticipation of the coming, in February, of its new pastor, Rev. D. Baines Griffiths, $200 have been expended on improving the audience-room and for hymn-books. Six persons united with the church April 5 and in all respects the outlook is encouraging.

PAOLA.—Important improvements in the edifice have recently been made, and there is growth in spiritual strength and usefulness. Interest is being added to the Sunday evening services by a young people's choir, self-organized. The Ladies' Aid and Missionary Society combined is active. The Y. P. S. C. E., one of the first organized in the State, recently celebrated its 10th anniversary. The pastor preaches regularly in a country district.

KANWAKA AND BARKER'S.—These churches, located in rural districts in Douglass County, now have a resident pastor for the first time in their history, and are happy and prosperous. Kanwaka received six to membership April 5, and maintains a Sunday school, prayer meeting and Y. P. S. C. E. Barker's has added 18 to its membership during the past year.

DOVER.—The Ladies' Society divides its receipts equally among home missions, foreign missions and special needs of its own church. It is now applying the latter fund towards erecting a parsonage. A "Pansy Club" in the church has bought an organ and singing books and is otherwise useful.

FORT SCOTT.—The church has large audiences and growing influence in the city, and is planning for early and marked advances in prosecuting its important work. A fund for enlarging and improving its finely located house of worship increases daily. Rev. A. O. Penniman is its pastor.

VALENCIA.—This church, which holds services at two points, recently observed Arbor Day by planting trees around its "Plymouth Rock" building. In the evening a musical entertainment was given which netted a good sum towards paying a debt.

ALANTHUS.—Rev. I. M. Waldrop, pastor at Buffalo Park and Collyer, is now holding a series of meetings at this rural point in Gove County. He is assisted by Mr. Crippen, a singer converted in the recent revival at Fairview School House.

SEVERY.—Twelve accessions have been received during the past year, making the present membership 58. Although pastorless for some months the Sunday school, prayer meeting and Ladies' Missionary Society are prosperous.

LAWRENCE.—Plymouth has added 100 members in two years. A Men's Club is doing much to increase attendance at the Sunday evening services. The Y. P. S. C. E. has 100 active members and an associate membership of 52.

INDIANAPOLIS.—This organization, located in a district near Osawatomie, has wrought a great and beneficent change in its neighborhood. It is a part of the field of Rev. T. S. Roberts, pastor at Osawatomie.

The Garnett Church has recently adopted the weekly system of payments and finds all its current indebtedness thus provided for.

Approbation to preach has been granted by the spring associations as follows: By Central Association, Mr. John Izard for one year; by Southern Association, Mr. W. R. Harris and Mr. T. E. B. Mason for one year; by Eastern Association, Mr. R. Howard Williams for one year, Mr. Herbert Thompson for six months.

Nebraska.

DODGE.—The evangelistic meetings led by Rev. C. S. Billings closed April 3. The Congregational church is the only one in the village, and the interest extended largely into the community. A number of children were deeply interested and 16 adults committed themselves to the cause of Christ. A Junior Endeavor Society has been organized with 25 members, and the pastor, Rev. Arthur Farnworth, already has quite a large list of names of those who wish to unite with the church.

STANTON.—Evangelist Billings held an eight-days' meeting with excellent results. The church was much refreshed and strengthened; 25 persons signed cards expressing their purpose to lead a Christian life; 10 of these are already pledged to unite with the church and others will follow. The day for old soldiers was peculiarly impressive. Mr. Billings has been assisted in these meetings by Mr. G. A. Raymer.

South Dakota.

VERMILLION.—Crowded houses greet the new pastor, Rev. G. E. Paddock. Four sermons on The Holy Ghost have each been followed by a Bible reading on the same subject at the midweek meeting. A series of evening sermons has been especially addressed to young people. The recent collection for home missions was double that of any previous year.

HURON.—The wife of Rev. W. H. Thrall died suddenly, April 10, of heart failure. She was secretary of the State W. H. M. S. and had formerly been a teacher under the A. M. A. and the N. W. E. C. The remains were taken for interment to Pepperell, Mass., her former home.

MITCHELL.—Mr. B. W. Burleigh becomes pastor of this church April 26. Mr. Burleigh is one of the first graduates of Yankton College, has studied law and graduates this spring from Chicago Seminary.

Arizona.

PRESCOTT.—The membership of the different departments has noticeably increased. The primary Sunday school class has doubled within a few months. A Young Men's Bible Class, started a few weeks ago, has grown so fast that it has been found necessary to divide it. The meeting house is now lighted by electricity. Rev. T. D. McLean is pastor.

TEMPE.—The membership has doubled during the association year and now numbers 56. The missionary interest here is enhanced by the fact that the missionary society was organized simultaneously with the church. Interest in both prayer meeting and Sunday school is steadily growing. Rev. Daniel Kloss is pastor.

TUCSON.—Much needed improvements on the church building are being made from the proceeds of a course of lectures arranged by the women of the church Rev. L. A. Pettibone is pastor.

PACIFIC COAST.

California.

LOS ANGELES.—Plymouth and Olivet have taken the preliminary steps in selling their present building lots and uniting forces in a more hopeful field, moving Plymouth edifice to a corner midway between the present sites.——East Side. After the close of the union meetings under the lead of Evangelist Patterson, Rev. D. D. Hill, aided by other pastors, continued services in his own church.——Central Avenue. This, the youngest of the sisterhood of city churches, dedicated a house of worship, free of debt, March 22, Rev. W. F. Day preaching the sermon. The Sunday school numbers over 100. Evangelist W. A. Lamb is holding helpful services.

NORWALK.—A church of 19 members, gathered by Rev. C. L. Kloss of Kansas City, was recognized by council on Good Friday.

VERNONDALE.—The people rejoice that Rev. J. J. Findlay of Bethlehem has accepted its call. They feel repaid for their long waiting.

Washington.

TACOMA.—First. The council called to dissolve the relations between Rev. L. H. Hallock, D. D., and this people passed resolutions of esteem and affection, commending his earnestness, eloquence, diligence and purity of life, recognizing the broader service he has rendered throughout the State, and affirming that only consideration for his health leads them to recommend his dismission.

WALLA WALLA.—This church, which has just entertained the local conference, has made gratifying progress during the three years' pastorate of Rev. E. L. Smith, having more than doubled its membership. It can now be counted among the strongest and most active in the city. Some of its members are doing effective missionary work in the surrounding country.

OTHER CHRISTIAN WORK.

The central committee of the Massachusetts Convention of Congregational Ministers asks the assistance of the churches to augment its charitable fund. The convention distributes the income of its fund, with such additional sums as are intrusted to it by the churches, to the widows or unmarried daughters of Congregational ministers in Massachusetts who die without pastoral settlement. It wishes to raise the amount which it gave last year to each of the 30 widows on its list, viz., $34, to something approaching $100 for each, a sum small enough in view of their necessities. To do this it needs from the churches sufficient contributions to give it—including the income of its funds—from $2,500 to $3,000 to distribute. The appeal is sent by the committee to the churches (Trinitarian and Unitarian, both of which are represented in the distribution of the convention), which in the past have shown an interest in the work by contributing to it. The appeal is apart and distinct from any that may be made for what may be designated as strictly denominational agencies for affording similar relief.

Contributions should be sent to Rev. Henry F. Jenks, Canton, Mass., the treasurer of the convention. To have them available for this year's distribution they ought to reach him as early as May 10. The appeal is indorsed by Alexander McKenzie, George M. Boynton, Arthur Little, E. E. Hale, Carlton A. Staples.

TOILET CHIFFONIERE.

We are building chiffonières this season with toilet top, as in the picture. This arrangement provides two small drawers with shelf above each and recess below. The mirror is so shaped that it can be swung outward with the least possible annoyance.

In place of the shallow drawers formerly used, we give here four deep receptacles. This permits the arrangement of the articles of underwear in separate high piles in each drawer.

The lowering of the sides so that the top is entirely exposed in front of the small drawers is unique and effective. This same treatment may be noticed on many other of the new styles for 1896.

Remember that our entire stock of chiffonières has been changed in the last few weeks. We are showing over 200 novelties in this one chiffonière wareroom.

Nervous

People find just the help they so much need, in Hood's Sarsaparilla. It furnishes the desired strength by purifying, vitalizing and enriching the blood, and thus builds up the nerves, tones the stomach and regulates the whole system. Read this:

"I want to praise Hood's Sarsaparilla. My health run down, and I had the grip. After that, my heart and nervous system were badly affected, so that I could not do my own work. Our physician gave me some help, but did not cure. I decided to try Hood's Sarsaparilla. Soon I could do all my own housework. I have taken Hood's Pills with Hood's Sarsaparilla, and they have done me much good. I will not be without them. I have taken 13 bottles of Hood's Sarsaparilla, and, through the blessing of God, it has cured me. I worked as hard as ever the past summer, and I am thankful to say I am well. Hood's Pills when taken with Hood's Sarsaparilla help very much." Mrs. M. M. MESSENGER, Freehold, Pa.

THE BUSINESS OUTLOOK.

With the advent of warm weather a more hopeful feeling has developed, visible both in the gain in the merchandise movement and in the advancing prices in the stock market. The change in sentiment came suddenly, and was stimulated, no doubt, by the evident intention of the President to act cautiously and conservatively in the Cuban affair. Then, again, it is believed that Congress will have adjourned by the middle of next month, and this belief is a comfort to many who charge Congress with injuring the trade movement.

The increase in general business is most noticeable in the West and South. The quotations of many staples show an upward tendency, and it is expected that a better demand will soon follow. There is no improvement in woolens, and the cotton goods situation continues to be overshadowed by the large stocks. A week or two of normal demand would, it is figured, reduce these accumulated stocks in first hands to the average volume.

Bank clearings last week show the better trade situation, being 6 per cent. more than the previous week, and 5.6 per cent. more than the corresponding week last year. In the stock market it has been a bull week, sugar being the speculative stock and advancing to 125⅞, with subsequent reaction.

BIOGRAPHICAL.

REV. JOHN WHEELER HARDING.

Mr. Harding was born in Waltham, Mass., in 1821, entered Amherst College in 1838, but finished his course at Yale in 1845. He graduated from Andover Theological Seminary in 1849, and the next year was ordained pastor over the church in Longmeadow, where his life work was done. Mr. Harding was a noble type of the old New England minister, of scholarly ancestry and social gifts, possessing cultured literary tastes, an enthusiast in philanthropic work, a man who had traveled widely in this country and abroad, yet he was content to spend forty years as the beloved pastor of a rural parish, the friend, counselor, teacher of the whole community, winning the name of "the bishop of Longmeadow." But his service was not confined to this town, for he reached out for a knowledge of and a share in larger activities. For many years he was connected with The Springfield Republican as a contributor of book reviews, correspondent and occasional editorial writer. It was, indeed, as a reporter in the higher realms of social and religious progress that he did his best work. Mr. Harding was greatly interested in the advancement of the Negro and Indian; he was a warm friend of the A. M. A., a corporate member of the A. B. C. F. M. and served on the executive committee of the C. H. M. S. for many years. After the celebration of the fortieth anniversary of his pastorate in Longmeadow he resigned his charge, and has since been in the habit of spending his winters in Ormond, Fla., where he has supplied a church. He died there very suddenly April 14.

REV. J. B. GRISWOLD.

While attempting to put out a fire in the woods near his home in South Manchester, Ct., April 16, Mr. Griswold was burned to death. He was born in Manchester, Ct., in 1830, graduated from Dartmouth College in 1860 and from Bangor Theological Seminary in 1863. He held pastorates in Holland and Braintree, Vt., Westford, Wellington, Talcottville, East Hampton, Millington and Lisbon, Ct., finally settling in South Manchester in 1885, where he served as pastor until his retirement.

AUSTIN ABBOTT, LL.D.

Mr. Abbott, the second son of Rev. Jacob Abbott, was born in Boston, Dec. 18, 1831, and died in New York city, April 19. He graduated at the University of New York in 1851, from which he received the degree of LL.D. in 1886. As an author of legal text-books and a jurist he had few peers in this country. Our letter from New York, in another column, describes his character as a man and his services as a Congregational layman.

PURE, rich blood is the true cure for nervousness, and Hood's Sarsaparilla is the one true blood purifier and nerve tonic.

Sarsaparilla Sense.

Any sarsaparilla is sarsaparilla. True. So any tea is tea. So any flour is flour. But grades differ. You want the best. It's so with sarsaparilla. There are grades. You want the best. If you understood sarsaparilla as well as you do tea and flour it would be easy to determine. But you don't. How should you? When you are going to buy a commodity whose value you don't know, you pick out an old established house to trade with, and trust their experience and reputation. Do so when buying sarsaparilla.

Ayer's Sarsaparilla has been on the market 50 years. Your grandfather used Ayer's. It is a reputable medicine. There are many Sarsaparillas—but only one Ayer's. It cures.

WOMAN'S BOARD PRAYER MEETING.

PILGRIM HALL, CONGREGATIONAL HOUSE, BOSTON, APRIL 17.

Mrs. A. C. Thompson presided and read the parable of the great supper from Luke 14, emphasizing the lesson that only the spirit of God impels to acceptable service. Mrs. Kellogg quoted Mr. Moody's remark, that he was unable to accept many invitations which he received, but he hoped to be present at the marriage supper of the Lamb, and he should be sorry to go alone. She also spoke of the different ways of carrying on good work and of the necessity of discrimination between the needs of the work of organizations where great care is exercised in planning and the many needs which, while they are real, are in one sense side issues, and which should not interfere with loyal attention to the work of the denominational societies.

The calendar for the week being devoted to the American College for Girls at Constantinople, Miss Day gave very interesting facts concerning that institution, recalling her own visit of several weeks a year ago. The attendance has been somewhat affected by the disturbed condition of the country, but the regular work has gone on without interruption, many of the students showing remarkable development of character. A self-government association takes charge of the internal order of the institution. A preparatory department is a necessity, owing to the small number of good schools in the great empire. A missionary society holds monthly meetings and is of great value to the religious life of the college, conducting its business affairs with energy and raising money for work in other lands. The alumnæ are proving themselves a power for good wherever their influence is exerted.

Mrs. Barton reported that Dr. and Mrs. Wheeler and Miss Emily Wheeler, with Mr. and Mrs. Allen and Mrs. Gates and her two children, were to leave Harpoot that very day to make the journey to Constantinople, which at best is very hard for invalids like Dr. Wheeler and Mrs. Allen. Miss Daniels had written of her women's meeting and the two Sunday schools under her care, in addition to school work.

Mrs. Billings gave the most recent word from Miss Child, who wrote in the Straits of Malacca and posted her letters at Singapore and Hong Kong. Her journey half way around the world had been safe and comfortable and full of pleasure and profit.

DR. DAVIS'S INSTALLATION AT THE ELIOT CHURCH.

Newton, one of our strong centers in Massachusetts, has added an important force to its pastoral leaders in the recent settlement of Dr. W. H. Davis, by whom a call from Eliot Church was accepted less than three months ago.

A great congregation, representing the large sisterhood of churches neighbor to the Newtons, assembled April 14, after the preliminary session of the examining council in the afternoon. Dr. E. L. Clark of Central Church, Boston, acted as moderator. Dr. Wolcott Calkins, the former pastor of the church, preached the sermon from 2 Cor. 5:19, the chief thought of the discourse being reconciliation. The installing prayer by Pres. W. G. Sperry of Olivet College was followed by the charge by Dr. Reuen Thomas. The right hand of fellowship was cordially extended by Rev. E. M. Noyes, who welcomed Dr. Davis back to his native New England after twelve years in the Interior, and the greeting of the city churches was brought by Dr. G. E. Merrill. Dr. G. A. Gordon gave the charge to the people. Beautiful floral decorations and chorus selections were delightful accompaniments of the service.

The church parlors were thronged again last Thursday evening at the reception to Dr. and Mrs. Davis, and nearly 1,000 persons made it an opportunity to greet the family in their future church home. Dr. Davis was born in Chelsea, Vt., received his college education at Dartmouth and graduated from Union Seminary in 1877. He has held but one pastorate besides that in Michigan, in Beverly, Mass.

THE GOSPEL FOR AN AGE OF DOUBT.

In his third Lyman Beecher lecture at Yale Seminary Dr. Henry van Dyke took as his specific subject The Unveiling of the Father. He said that the five causes which Gibbon gives as the primary causes of the marvelous growth of Christianity are all secondary. They are really effects pointing back to the cause, which is Christ. To get a true picture of Christ we must get the view of what the early Christians saw in him. The disciples felt that by the person of Jesus they were in contact with something invisible. They saw in Him a personal unveiling of God. Christ saw that they would. He meant that they should. The whole New Testament testifies to this, to the conception of a "Christ over all, God blessed forever." The poets and preachers of the early church presented this conception. Not that Christ said things about God, but that he revealed God in himself.

This idea adapts itself to the needs of the modern age. The whole doctrine of development looks to an incarnation. Such an idea is in line with modern thought. No attempt to write a life of Christ except as a divine Lord and Master has had any influence with mankind at large. This age will not listen to any preacher preaching Christ who does not preach a divine Christ.

The religion of the incarnation is the only religion that brings God near to us. Deism is an inscrutable hieroglyphic. Theism is not living and personal enough. Christianity is personal. Its messenger is the message. To take away the divine Christ is to take away the assurance of a divine personal sympathy.

Following his earnest and impressive plea for a gospel of a divine Christ, Dr. van Dyke in his next lecture urged the preaching of a gospel which shall present Christ as The Human Life of God. During the ages of theological refinement and definition this was lost. It was lost in art. The fathers allowed theology to modify, obscure and eclipse the humanity of Christ. They substituted a metaphysical idea set forth in decrees of councils and in the writings of theologians. They lost sight of his human limitations and of his human growth and development. All this the fathers explained away and by means not always honest. All this is what still obscures in theology. Formulas obliterate realities. They lost the personal, loving, sympathizing Christ. The worship of Mary was a reprisal from the lost humanity of her Son. "In the mediæval period," said Dr. van Dyke, "I believe that Mariolatry was fully justified. It was an effort to regain the lost humanity of Jesus."

The New Testament picture is the graphic picture of a person. The New Testament writers were never in doubt as to the human nature of Christ. We find there no indications of any double life. Superhuman in his origin and office, in his earthly existence he enters without reserve and without deception into all the limitations and conditions of human life. This is the Christ of Paul. The whole value of the atonement rests on the reality of the incarnation.

WAS THE SERMON AT WHITEFIELD'S FUNERAL ORIGINAL?

BY REV. HORACE C. HOVEY, D. D.

A few days ago a descendant of Rev. Jonathan Parsons, the first pastor of the First Presbyterian Church of Newburyport (Capt. Moses J. Mulliken), put in my hands a remarkable manuscript. On its margin was the record that it was a sermon preached at the funeral of Mrs. Mary Sawyer, Feb. 27, 1756. But by this date and title it does not appear among the sixty published sermons of this divine. Further examination, however, has brought a curious coincidence to light.

The sermon, having served its immediate end, was laid aside, and no record is made of its being used again for fourteen years. Then occurred an event that filled the home and church of Mr. Parsons with mourning which extended thence throughout the world. This was the sudden death of Rev. George Whitefield at 6 A. M., Sunday, Sept. 30, 1770. It has always been regarded as a wonderful feat, showing great intellectual ability as well as surprising self-command, that Mr. Parsons was able to meet the thousands who gathered that very day to hear Mr. Whitefield, announce to them the tidings of his death and at once proceed to preach his funeral sermon, and to do it with such success as to strike the keynote for all other discourses that marked that occasion in America and England. His text was from Phil. 1: 21, "For me to live is Christ; and to die is gain." The plan is elaborate with three main divisions and numerous subdivisions, together with "uses," "motives" and application. The style is clear, logical and spiritual, but is unimpassioned until we come to the eulogy, which glows at white heat. This sermon is No. 12 in the third volume of Parsons's published sermons. But it is also identical, almost word for word, with the manuscript of the discourse preached in 1756 at the funeral of Mrs. Mary Sawyer, so far as the sermonic portion goes, differing only in the closing eulogy. Now this is not to the disparagement of Mr. Parsons.

The facts were doubtless these: The pastor and the evangelist had just returned from an exhausting preaching tour. Mr. Whitefield was announced to preach on Sunday, but instead of doing so he went to heaven. The house was in a turmoil. The neighbors gathered in. Many things had to be done at once. Meanwhile thousands were assembling flushed with expectation of hearing the great evangelist. An emergency must be met, and in meeting it Mr. Parsons did what was a very sensible act. He selected from his pile of sermons one that had been preached fourteen years before, hurriedly revised it, adding the closing eulogy out of the fullness of his heart, and gave the discourse to the waiting congregation. The material was his own and he did with it what he pleased.

The singular fact is that this original autograph of the sermon should have thus unexpectedly come to light after so many years, and should have been given anew, as was done on Sunday, April 12, from the pulpit beneath which rest Whitefield's remains. It also explains why the heirs have kept the relic with such care that not a page is torn nor a word missing.

How cautiously men sink into nameless graves, while now and then one forgets himself into immortality.—Wendell Phillips, speaking of Lovejoy.

A MARKET MAN'S LUCK.

SAVED AT THE VERY BRINK OF THE GRAVE.

Made Over New from the Soles of His Feet to the Top of His Head, by Prof. Dixi Crosby's Prize Formula.

"I was sick for nearly two years," said George H. Dunning, of Faneuil Hall Market, the historic landmark of Boston. "I was run down, had nervous prostration, lost my appetite, could not sleep without opiates, had little control over my limbs, was so light-headed that I was afraid to walk about alone, could not see except through a blur, had a constant pain in the pit of my stomach, and had abandoned business, pleasure, and, practically, life itself. When the crisis came I was out of my head and my temperature was up to 105 degrees. When the neighbors came to inquire the doctor told them that I was past hope. My nurse made another appointment, as if it was certain that my death would come in five days at the outside.

"I had one chance in a hundred, and I took that chance. All the doctors and medicines had failed in my case, and I threw them all over. It seems as if there are new kinds of diseases in these days of steam and electricity, and new treatments are needed.

"Puritana was just what I needed. When I got a bottle and began using it I found that I was being made over new, just as it says, from the soles of my feet to the top of my head.

"It stopped that miserable pain at the pit of my stomach; it made me eat like a hungry man and sleep like a healthy, tired man. It cleared my head so that I can now see without glasses and walk home through the crowded streets without the least danger of falling down under the horses' feet.

"It seems good to get back to the market again, and it makes me want to hug the man who discovered Puritana when I realize that I am well, even better than I was before I was taken sick. My wife says that it is preposterous to say that anything but Puritana saved my life, for it also saved me from the danger of paralysis. At that time my friends would not have given two cents for my chances. That is why I do not lose a chance to tell about Puritana; for I believe a great many lives could be saved if people only knew what it would do.

"I will never be without Puritana as long as I live, and I believe that will be some time, as I am growing younger and happier every day."

GENERAL HOWARD ROLL OF HONOR.

TO PAY THE HOME MISSIONARY SOCIETY DEBT IN SHARES OF $100.

In reporting the following list of additional pledges on the Gen. O. O. Howard Roll of Honor, we are gratified to be able to state that all of the society's obligations for the fiscal year, ending March 31, have been met from current receipts. Eighty thousand dollars have also been paid upon the heavy debt with which the previous year closed. There now remains a balance of some $53,000 upon that debt, for the payment of which the General Howard Roll of Honor was inaugurated at the annual meeting in June last. This is a noble response to the call of the honored president of the society. For the completion of this monument to the name of General Howard and the wiping out of the entire debt with which the seventieth year opened, the society looks to the friends of the work, more than 800 of whom have already responded. Let 500 more have a share in the Gen. O. O. Howard Roll of Honor. The subscription books will be kept open until the annual meeting at New Haven, Ct., in June next, unless the roll shall be completed before that date.

GLEANINGS FROM OUR MAIL BAG.

Dr. Newman Smyth, in your March 5 issue, nent "recent revivalism," etc., asks "a still arger question, whether we are to keep on in ur accustomed work in our churches, seek- ng to reform abuses and to pervade with a nore Christlike spirit the existing relation of nen in their business and politics." Dr. Her- on, in his organized Christian society, in vhich Christians who have are to share freely he good they have with their brethren who ave not, by virtue of the social organization, r the fixed laws of it (if that is not it wherein s his proposed society in advance of the pres- nt one), overlooks the essential of voluntari- ess in all personal righteousness or virtue. f we are to bestow the share to others of what re have in obedience simply to an organic aw or condition of society, our righteousness herein is in peril of becoming like the right- ousness of the scribes and Pharisees, who aid their tithes in obedience to ecclesiastical nd social requirement. Any virtue or right- ousness done under any stress other than ntire voluntary feeling at once loses charac- er as such. Prohibition laws help temperance nly in an indirect way. When executed hey keep temptation out of the path of the veak. They do no more. Organic prohibi- ion never directly produced the virtue of emperance. Pass a sumptuary law that no nan shall drink liquor and make him obey it. ou may produce abstinence, but you do not roduce the personal virtue of temperance. ikewise righteousness and love toward our ellowman can be produced only under condi- ions which leave us to be entirely voluntary n them. In present conditions of church and ociety they must be voluntary, while in Dr. erron's proposed society they might be so ndeed, but would stand on peril often of be- ng far otherwise. There is, therefore, but ne answer to Dr. Smyth's question, an affirm- tive.

Was the furnace into which the three He- rew children were thrown by Nebuchadnez- ar heated one-seventh or seven times more nan it was wont to be heated? The words one seven times," of Dan. 3: 19, are differ- ntly interpreted by different persons

J. D. P.

The number seven, a "sacramental" num- er to the Babylonians, has probably the orce of an intense adjective. The writer neant to say that the furnace was heated to ne utmost, so that the men who put the three Hebrews into it were consumed by the flames.

"DECADENT AND LIFELESS BELIEFS."

In the report of Dr. Beach's paper on Re- onstructive Theology, printed in The Congre- ationalist of March 19, occurs the expression, decadent and lifeless beliefs," with the im- lication that such beliefs are being taught in ur seminaries. This expression and others ke it are very common. The religious week- es and the newspapers abound in such refer- nces to our theological schools and pulpit. urrent literature is full of these flings at ible doctrines. Lectures and sermons also ake their turn at kicking theology and the heological schools. A considerable number f long-suffering Christian people are growing ired of this general accusation of the Chris- ian religion, the Bible, the church and the eminaries. Now will some one be specific nd tell us in plain words just what particu- r beliefs he regards as "decadent and life- ss," and in what theological schools they re being taught? Does he mean repentance, egeneration, sanctification, salvation by a ivine Saviour? Does he mean the teachings f the Bible about God, sin, holiness, heaven, ell and eternity? Surely these are Bible octrines. Are they "decadent and lifeless"? f they are we would like to know why. Is he Bible "decadent and lifeless"? But just hat are these beliefs that are so often abused in a general way? The writer knows of a gentleman who has a son whom he hopes will enter the ministry, and would be glad to know what schools are teaching "decadent and life- less beliefs."

G. S. Rollins.

An editorial in your issue of April 2, in which you refer to the words of "a pastor of an old New England church," who writes "that the Congregational ministry was never in such straits as now," was of much interest to me as a Western man, because here we see more, perhaps, of the beginning of that which is one of the prime factors in producing these "straits," the large influx of ministers from other denominations, who have an idea that any one is a Congregational minister if in the pulpit of a Congregational church. Some- times we gain a grand man, who is really with us at heart, but more often such men are a rest- less element only seeking change of pasture. In this way they work much hardship to the Congregational ministry proper, and are of questionable value to the churches in the methods they use, in their lack of acquaint- ance and real sympathy with our ideas and methods.

The Congregational minister who is with- out a field of labor finds himself a competing candidate with a host of ministers of other de- nominations, who are often preferred because they will be acquisitions from outside, and will supplement the force which is so inadequate to the demands of our rapidly growing fields. The Congregational churches appear to believe in free trade; their ministers have no protection whatever against large numbers from denom- inations which do not reciprocate in the least, and which are generally not up to our ideas in intellectual culture. Chicago Theological Seminary has recently raised its curriculum and standard of scholarship, but what boots it, while our churches are wide open to preach- ers from several denominations, who come to us on their own standards, without any ex- amination, either mental, moral or theologi- cal? They are received with open arms as duly accredited Congregational ministers, merely because some church invites them and they accept. If they choose to present themselves to some association of ministers and churches, they are received on credentials which have no savor of our faith or polity. We may close the front door but the back door is open wide.

CHRISTIAN ENDEAVOR NOTES.

The kings of two of the Samoan Islands are active C. E. members, although one is quite an old man.

In a district of New York city visits were ex- changed by all the societies in one month.

An invalid's chair, fully equipped, is owned by an English society, and the sunshine committee em- ploys it for the benefit of sick or aged persons.

The largest known attendance at the city caucuses in Council Bluffs, Io., followed the action of the Christian Citizens' League of the young people's societies in sending out postal cards appealing to Christian voters to do their duty.

At the late quarterly meeting the trustees of the United Society reported 43,900 societies, few countries in the world now being without them. The conference of presidents of State, Territorial, and Provincial unions, to occupy the entire day before the opening of the convention, was arranged,

A society in Connecticut occasionally holds a "staff meeting," the idea being taken from the custom on some foreign single-track railroads, where no train enters a given section unless the engineer holds a given staff. In these meetings a Bible serves as the staff, and, as it is passed around, each person is expected to take part. There are no breaks in the meetings.

The new tent to be made for the convention at Washington will be called Tent Washington, and together with Tents Williston and Endeavor will be pitched on the White Lot, south of the White House. The headquarters of the Committee of '96 will be the armory of the Washington Light Infantry, just across the street from the White Lot. It is expected that the rate of one fare for the round trip will be offered by the railroads.

BUNYAN'S COTTAGE AT ELSTOW, WHERE HIS MARRIED LIFE BEGAN—THE GARDEN DOOR.

"THIS woman and I," says Bunyan, "came together as poor as poor might be, not having so much household stuff as a dish or spoon betwixt us both." It was an unpromising beginning, but many that are more promising turn out worse. It may be that where there are health and hope and honest industry, mutual love and trust can better supply the lack of dish and spoon than an abundance of dishes and spoons can supply the lack of love. Though the young wife brought no dower of wealth to her husband, she brought to him that which wealth cannot buy—saintly memories of a godly home and trained instincts for good—and, as we have seen, she would beguile their summer evening walks and their fireside winter talks by memories of the good man, her father, who had gone to heaven.—Rev. John Brown, in his Life of John Bunyan.

THE AMERICAN SUNDAY SCHOOL UNION has been at work seventy-one years for the retired rural districts. Its union methods specially commend it to communities of sparse populations divided in religious sentiments. Its missionaries visit families, distribute religious literature, hold evangelistic meetings and organize Sunday Schools. Probably no evangelizing agency has larger results for the amount expended. 11,000,000 children are yet out of Sunday School. Will you help to save them? Send to Rev. Addison P. Foster, D. TIME heals at last all but mortal wounds, and brings together long divided friends for common service, as the reunion, now assured, of the two Congregational bodies of the metropolitan district of New York once more proves. The New York and Brooklyn Association is the older and smaller of the two bodies, the Manhattan Conference having been formed after the troubles in Plymouth Church twenty years ago in order to avoid responsibility for methods of church discipline and to emphasize opinions in regard to church order which were in dispute at the time. A new generation has grown up to which the old differences have ceased to be important, and the movement for union has been in progress for some time. The adoption by the New York and Brooklyn Association of the name (with an addition) and the constitution and standing rules of the Manhattan Conference, which action we report elsewhere, stands for the acceptance upon sober second thought by all the churches of our order in and about New York of the more conservative and careful, as well as more modern, setting forth of Congregational order and usage. With this cordial union of strength and influence we hope to see a great and steadily growing advance in Congregational church life in New York, where it is relatively weak, and in Brooklyn, where it has long been vigorous and aggressive. So may all controversies and disagreements yield under the influence of the Spirit of God in favor of a larger union and co-operation for the advance of Christ's kingdom.

Chicago has been comparatively free from heresy cases since the trial of Professor Swing, but the call of a Congregational minister, Rev. F. B. Vrooman, to the Kenwood Presbyterian Church and his examination by the Presbytery of Chicago have precipitated a case of just the kind which the newspapers love. At a first examination Mr. Vrooman seems to have shown singular ignorance of the history and standards of the denomination into which he asked to be received, extending even to ignorance of the fact that he was to be examined in theology. At an adjourned meeting of presbytery he presented a full and frank statement of belief and was examined more at length, accepted the standards according to the formula prescribed and was thereupon received into the presbytery subject to a complaint and appeal to the Synod of Illinois, which will be heard next October and will probably reach the General Assembly of a year from the present May. The only comment which we wish to make upon the matter at this stage is that Congregational ministers should remember that the Presbyterian Church is a walled garden, and that they ought to know something about the dimensions of the gate if they wish to enter it.

We were in error last week in forecasting the result of the vote upon the amendment admitting women to membership in the Methodist General Conference. At the time of writing there was an apparent three-fourths majority in its favor, but by the latest returns, which include all the American conferences, the vote falls short by eighteen votes, while even if those votes had been secured the result might have been challenged upon the ground that the foreign conferences had not had the opportunity of action. It is still open to the conference to admit the three women who have been sent up as delegates by a vote, interpreting the constitution as it now exists, just as a previous conference interpreted it by excluding the women who applied to it, but there is a general feeling that this would not be a satisfactory settlement of the question and Zion's Herald, which has all along been in favor of admission, voices the soberer opinion in saying: "Let the whole matter, therefore, go to the General Conference for resubmission according to the constitutional methods prescribed for making changes in the restrictive rules. This is the only just, safe and, in the end, satisfactory course. A church council is no place for forced and unnatural processes. It cannot be claimed that any vital interest of the church will suffer by such necessary delay." This is the second time that this matter has been submitted to the conferences. It failed of a constitutional majority (of three-fourths) on the first occasion by two thousand votes and now by only eighteen in a total of something over ten thousand. With such growth of sentiment in its favor it is hardly probable that it can fail on a third trial.

Our preparation for the Lord's Supper is also the best of preparation for advance in the Christian life. "Let a man prove himself and so let him eat the bread and drink of the cup." The bread and wine are symbols in which we, according to his promise, become more fully partakers of Christ's life. He who is seeking an increase of that life will be awake to all its possibilities for his own soul. Daily spiritual communion is the best precursor of the visible sacrament. He who lets the ordinary opportunity of prayer and service slip unheeded by will hardly be prepared to use the special opportunity of the holy table. The proving is to be a mirror held up to our daily thought, that we may see whether we are discriminating between Christ and the world, for if the presence of Christ has no power over us in daily living, it can hardly be effective in greatly changing us in the brief moments of our presence at the communion service. That will highten enjoyment, it can never create it. It will quicken faith, it can never give it a beginning. It will stimulate self-consecration, it cannot originate it. The memory is to be of Christ in our own experience as well as of Christ on the cross. However faulty our life with him has been, however surely we come with repentance as well as joy, we must have something to recall of our own intercourse with him, or the opportunity will bring us nothing but disappointment.

THE PEACE CONFERENCE AT WASHINGTON.

The conference of five hundred of the choicest men of the nation, held at the national capital last week, was in some respects the most significant gathering of which man has record, whether it be judged by the sublimity of the theme considered, or the sum total of virtue and wisdom represented by those present. Citizens of a puissant nation, soon to be the wealthiest and strongest the world has ever seen; representing a European race stock that shows more vitality than any other; speaking a language which bids fair to be the world's language; enjoying political rights and performing civic duties which make them rulers as well as the ruled; they met not to plan for national or racial or personal aggrandizement, but to hasten the coming of the kingdom of God, the parliament of man, the day when the ethics of Christ shall control the acts of all nations as they do now those of many individuals.

These men are not dreamers only. Their records as statesmen, soldiers, educators, administrators of business interests belie any such indictment. Their confidence in God's revealed message respecting his preference for love and peace is such that, in working for the end which they have in view, they know that they have him as an ally. Their experience as American citizens justifies them in believing that if a Supreme Court can compel the instant and glad obedience to its decisions of commonwealths as numerous, vast and diverse as the States of our Union, then it is not a vain delusion to extend the range of so beneficent a principle and create a similar international tribunal. If imperial States like New York and Texas permit nine men sitting in Washington to decree what is consonant or inconsonant with a national constitution, why cannot nine men representing Christendom determine whether nations have broken treaties, violated the code of international law and done injustice to each other, and assess damages? They can, but how would their decree be enforced? The curse of civilization today is excess of legislation and lack of law enforcement. An international judiciary demands an international police force, and police sometimes have to use handcuffs and clubs. But a policeman is not a warrior.

TURKEY AND THE UNITED STATES.

At the meeting of the New York and Brooklyn Association last week Secretary Creegan of the American Board expressed his opinion forcibly, saying, "Would to God Daniel Webster could sit in the chair of the Secretary of State for just one fortnight; would to God Old Hickory were President for just two short weeks; would we had a Farragut now"; and the association unanimously adopted the following minute introduced by Rev. J. M. Whiton:

In view of the increasing gravity of the situation in the Turkish empire, especially the efforts of the Turkish Government to expel all Christian missionaries, and in view of the fact that the continuance of mission work will depend, to a very great degree, upon the vigor with which the Government of this country insists upon the treaty right of missionaries to reside in the Turkish empire and prosecute their work, and in view of the immediate occasion furnished by the expulsion of Rev. George P. Knapp of Bitlis from that city, notwithstanding the pledges given to the United States minister at Constantinople; therefore,

Resolved, That this association call the attention of the gentlemen who represent this State in the Senate and House of Representatives to the situation, and request them to do all in their power to insure for all American citizens resident in the Turkish empire the protection in their life and work which is assured to them by the treaties between this country and Turkey.

This is a subject on which every approaching Congregational deliberative body should make a most forcible utterance during the coming weeks. The New Jersey Association last week prepared to let the congressmen from New Jersey, Pennsylvania, Maryland and Virginia know what some of their constituents expect them to do in this matter. This is no time to lessen the number of our warships in the vicinity of Turkey, and yet that is what the Washington officials seem bound to order. Let the Department of State and your congressman know how you feel. The right of petition still exists, Senator Hill of New York to the contrary notwithstanding.

How the situation impresses the healthy American mind may be inferred from Albert Shaw's editorial in the May Review of Reviews, in which he says:

Americans have spent or invested for the general welfare of Turkey's subjects in Armenia and other parts of Asia Minor ten or fifteen millions of dollars. Our Government does not seem to us to be protecting American interests in that quarter with anything like the firmness that England, France, Germany or Russia would show under like circumstances. We believe that there is the greatest reason for a policy at the present moment toward Turkey that shall go if necessary to the extent of an ultimatum, to be followed up by the sending of a powerful fleet into the Eastern Mediterranean.

Fortunately, we seem to have in Mr. Riddle, now in charge of our affairs at Constantinople, one who understands the Porte and treats the Turk as he needs to be treated. Last Friday he heard that the Turkish authorities at Iskanderoon refused to deliver Rev. George P. Knapp to the proper officials and instead of sending him on to Constantinople for trial were preparing to send him out of the country in a European steamer sailing that night. Mr. Riddle immediately showed to the Turkish foreign minister his written promise to deliver Mr. Knapp to the American legation for trial, advised Tewfik Pasha that it would be better for him to keep this promise, and showed him telegrams which he had sent to the American consuls at Iskanderoon and Mersine, instructing them to summon aid from American cruisers if it should be needed to secure the deliverance of Mr. Knapp. On Saturday Mr. Riddle received dispatches stating that Mr. Knapp had been released.

THE LEGISLATURE IN THE LOWELL CASE.

We have purposely refrained from discussing the internal trouble which has had for its center the continuance of the pastorate of Rev. Mr. Kenngott over the First Church and society of Lowell—a pastorate which commenced September, 1892, but which soon resulted in unpleasant divisions. We are concerned only with a recent act of the legislature of Massachusetts which is too important to be left unnoticed.

The organization at Lowell is the one which is very generally in use among our churches—that of a religious (corporate) society, and a church connected therewith. The society is recognized by the constitution of Massachusetts as the body which exclusively holds the property and makes all contracts with the pastor, although our churches, by comity, concur. The society in Lowell is, like almost all our societies in the State, of this character. A church indeed may, under the statute of 1887, become incorporate and have a separate existence, with the rights of such a society, but the Lowell church is not of this character. Chapter 38 of the Public Statutes says: "A religious society may make by-laws not repugnant to the laws of the commonwealth and may in such by-laws prescribe the manner in which persons may become members." The Lowell society has such a by-law, which is a common one, to the effect that any member of the church may be proposed, and, his name being inserted in the warrant, may be admitted if the society shall vote in favor thereof.

It seems that the latest test vote in the Lowell church in December last showed 206 in favor of Mr. Kenngott's retention and 163 against. This was before the majority so changed the by-laws as to make children voters. The minister resigned, to take effect Dec. 31 last. The church accepted the resignation without dissent, and the society also, by a two-thirds vote, in the same month. The pastorate, therefore, terminated at the date mentioned. The church had, however, rescinded its vote a few days before that time and asked the pastor to remain, to which he gave no answer until long after the pastorate was ended; nor was this vote of the church of any legal force whatever. The action of the society has never been reversed and the pastorate was ended Dec. 31. An effort to get a vote in the society to restore Mr. Kenngott to the pastorate which he had voluntarily quitted failed by a close vote. His attempt to occupy the pulpit was stopped by an injunction from a judge of the Supreme Court, which is still awaiting final action. Failing of a majority in the society, the adherents of Mr. Kenngott appealed to the legislature, and the following after sharp discussion is the result: "Any person above the age of twenty-one years who is a member of the First Congregational Church in Lowell, Mass., and hires, and for the term of six months pays for, a pew or sitting in said church shall be a member of the society of said First Congregational Church upon signing the roll of membership of said society, or giving notice to the clerk or any other officer of said society of his desire so to do."

The object of this legislation was open. The majority of men and women in the church attached to Mr. Kenngott could thus force themselves into the society, a corporate body holding the property, and control its action. It could do this without the consent of the society in a single instance, and against its will. The act thus nullifies the general statute, which provides that each society may prescribe its own conditions of membership, and it is in opposition to that provision of Chapter 38, which says: "Religious societies, whether corporate or unincorporate, shall continue to have and enjoy their existing rights, privileges and immunities," under which this society was incorporated, and by virtue of which it seems to have vested rights.

While we do not overlook the unwisdom of appealing to the legislature to overturn the established policy of the State for the sake of a petty case hinging upon a petty and transient question, we are more concerned with the character and effect of this legislation upon our churches. Certain facts seem to us evident.

1. The legislature of Massachusetts has allowed itself, under skillful manipulation, to be made the tool of one party as against another in a petty local church quarrel, the only point at issue being whether a minister, who had voluntarily resigned, should be put back into the pastorate which he had left. Such a course warrants the presumption that succeeding legislatures may be appealed to as successfully by any minority in a church trouble. This unprecedented legislation appeals to every faction which may arise in any society.

2. The legislature has singled out one solitary society from the five hundred in this State to deprive it of the rights guaranteed by the statutes of the commonwealth. If it had passed a general law, its action indeed would have had some dignity. As it is, the act should have honestly provided to amend the statutes so as to read: "A religious society, except the First Congregational Society in Lowell, may make by-laws," etc. The same vicious, special legislation may, however, go on in other cases.

3. The danger to the rights of societies is, of course, apparent. The legislature undertakes to force into a corporate society, which holds and is responsible for property which it erects or purchases, or for funds which it may receive in trust, outside persons who may desire for any object, right or wrong, wise or foolish, to get control. Those intrusted with, or entitled to hold, the property may be overwhelmed by persons who can demand entrance by their own will with this single act in their hands. Under this precedent there is not a religious society in the commonwealth of any denomination, or one for any secular purpose, which is safe. The power assumed by the legislature jeopardizes every organization by forcing into it enough persons to swamp it. The same exercise of power, in a modified form, could grasp the Old South Church with its great interests, or any Baptist church or Methodist, or Unitarian or Roman Catholic. It could flood our American Congregational Association from outside to obtain control of its attractive property. The American Board could, of course, be revolutionized if the legislature should be induced, under the appeal of some demagogue, to give the power of entrance into the hands of any quietly organized aspirants. The legislature could legislate into a corporate library all persons who pay for the use of books for six months. We do not say that this will be done, but we do say that by this remarkable legislation the door is open.

Our polity presents a fair method of settling church difficulties. It is by the arbitration of a mutual council. The calling of such a council has been urged upon the Lowell church by a great portion of its members, by ministers outside and by the friendly, formal urgency of neighboring churches. This resort to arbitration, according to the public prints, has been regularly refused by the church, which has preferred an appeal to the legislature with the above result, which, while it may gratify for a time one minister and his adherents, must excite serious consideration among our churches and societies.

As to the constitutional question, we are not called upon to consider it. It may be expected, however, that the society thus deprived of its rights will, for the public good, see that this enactment is passed upon by the Supreme Court of this commonwealth.

STEPS TOWARD UNION.

The first steps in the path toward church union are steps of acquaintance. When we know each other better we shall lose the suspicion which hinders trust. And the second step is co-operation without abandoning old customs, forms and names.

A long step toward this second stage seems to have been reached by the joint conference of the Ohio State Conference of Christians and the Central Ohio Conference of Congregationalists, which met in the Christian Church of Piqua, O., as elsewhere reported by a correspondent. President Weston of the Christian Biblical School of Stanfordville, N. Y., one of the two moderators of the conference, expressed its feeling when he said that the object of the conference was to make a public recognition of unity and to nourish it in every possible way. "We do not discuss unity, we assume it." The resolutions adopted emphasize character as the basis of mutual understanding, advise the holding of other conferences for a wider constituency under care of committees of the two bodies, meetings of the regular conferences of both bodies at the same time and place, mutual counsel of executive officers involving a beginning of common work and an avoidance of rivalry or competition, and the exchange of pulpits.

Such a program as this can only be carried out upon the lines of common faith and enthusiasm. The suspicion of selfishness will be the beginning of disintegration. It is full of the promise of good because it proceeds from life to action. It justifies the work of the National Council at Syracuse, and proves that its declaration of a proposed basis of church union is well adapted to the needs of the time.

If this needed any further illustration it might be found in the fact that the Church Union, New York city, hitherto edited by Mrs. E. B. Granniss, but now owned and edited by Rev. Samuel T. Carter, says that the platform on church unity formulated at Syracuse by the last National Council can be wisely kept before the churches. It has the same point in its favor as the Lambeth platform—offered by the Episcopalians—had; it is an honest, manly proposition, with serious intent behind it to accomplish, if possible, something in the matter. It has this advantage over the Lambeth platform, that it does not demand any peculiar institution of Congregationalism as one of its essentials of unity, as the Lambeth platform does one of the peculiarities of Episcopalianism. Indeed, there has been no criticism of these proposals on the ground that they demand too much; the criticism has all been the other way. No church seems to have found in them anything that was unacceptable, but, of course, every church has seen absent from them what it feels ought to be accepted. That was necessary, and is probably the best commendation of them.

THE HEROIC LIFE.

Christ calls his disciples friends, and in Armenia we are witnessing one fulfillment of his own words, "Greater love hath no man than this, that a man lay down his life for his friends." What our Lord did for all, these true disciples have not been afraid to do for him. In this the identity of Christ with his people and the exchange of the true offices of friendship between him and them is manifest to all the world.

In our unheroic age—too much taken up with questions of business success and pleasure gaining—there are crowns for martyrs and heroic lives and deaths. So much at least of inspiration and example we owe to the jealousies and cowardice of so-called Christian Europe, which have given free play to the hateful cruelty of Turk and Kurd.

There is a stirring in many hearts in our own land of admiration, almost of envy, in reading of the good confessions made at the sword's point and in the face of fire and famine. It is so unlike the smug respectability of our lives—the humdrum of our days and the quiet of our nights—that we are almost tempted to wish that we might also show our faith in such heroic fashion. To bear a thousand stings of small temptation, to keep our faith bright in a thousand petty trials! We are weary of it all, and almost dare to long for one heroic hour of witness bearing—one fierce conflict in the concentrated light of the world's view—and then the martyr's crown.

If there is something noble in such a longing, we fear that there is something weak and theatrical as well. Martyrdom is not usually arranged like a scene in a melodrama, where all the stage machinery works smoothly and the audience applauds just at the right moment. It is a grim, uncomfortable experience through which our brothers in Armenia have been called to pass, and many a dainty Christian who, buoyed up by excitement, might have faced the sword, would come very near to yielding in the cold and damp of mountain camps, in weakness from the lack of food, in the mere discomforts of ruined homes and the hopelessness of succor. It is well that we are not too severely tried, for the trial might reveal our weakness, not our strength.

Laying down the life is, after all, no more essential in times of open persecution than in times and places where Christianity has power and recognition, and it may be no more heroic. It is everywhere the proof of love, but it takes on different forms and reveals itself in different fashions. There are some who would be glad to die, so heavy are their burdens and so great their disappointments, who live on for love's sake through years of self-denial, which only Christ's presence can make joyful. Many lay down their lives in daily service. They do not call it martyrdom, they do it gladly, but perhaps some who look on in wonder, not having shared the love which makes the sacrifice of self a joy, may say, "See what a martyr that man is making of himself," and the words spoken in carelessness may be as true as though they were uttered of the prisoner in the amphitheater, who might have life if he would throw a pinch of incense on the flame in denial of his Lord, or of the Armenian victims of the Turk.

The spirit of boasting brought the self-chosen martyrdom of the early church into disrepute. There will be a trial for every one, but it is not for us to choose our cross. Those who endure and give for Christ do not parade their sacrifices. Their number is uncounted in the earth and their ranks not yet closed up. Those who will show their love by laying down their life for Christ may join them, may accept their work in the place which God appoints, may share Christ's joy in life, his strength in death. In the drudgery of home or in the face of the executioner alike men offer to the Crucified a copy of the love he showed to them. The heroic life is in the spirit's consecration, not the mere outward circumstance of giving.

CHRIST'S TEMPTATIONS AND OURS.

Our Lord's temptations were as actual as any of ours. Some have attempted to treat them as unreal, regarding it as an irreverence to Christ to suppose him to have been truly tempted or as an impossibility because of the mysterious union of deity with humanity in him. But they have persuaded few. The teaching of the Scripture record is plain. Moreover, if Jesus were not tempted as really as we are, the glory of his successful resistance vanishes, and his example in that respect is of no value to sinful men and women. Anybody could overcome evil if it were not possible for him to yield.

What is commonly called the temptation of Jesus, his experience in the wilderness, was not by any means his only trial of that sort. He was tempted sorely in the garden of Gethsemane. And there is no reason to doubt that, in addition to such special and terrible temptations, he too was beset daily and hourly by many such allurements to evil as beguile us. His power of resistance was far greater than ours because it had the sturdiness of unvarying fidelity and success. Yielding had not enfeebled it. But he had inherited a temptable human nature from his earthly ancestors, just as we do, and many a form of sin must have presented itself to him enticingly although invariably to be refused and repelled.

It is upon this fact that the preciousness and power of his sympathy for us are founded. He does not understand our temptations merely by an omniscience which stands outside of and apart from our lives and looks on like a spectator, and knows everything about them simply because it cannot help knowing. He understands sympathetically, because he has been tempted just so himself and knows how hard it is to resist.

This special knowledge and sympathy, in addition to his universal love, qualify and prompt him to deliver us when we cry to him for help. He understands just how to send the aid which we need and when, whether by the encouragement of his Spirit in our hearts or by the suggestion of friendly human counsel and assistance. He was subjected to temptation bodily, intellectually and spiritually. The whole range of his being as a man was included in the assaults made upon his holiness. Therefore no one of us, not even the most often, most sorely, most cruelly tempted one of us all, need fear applying to him for help in vain.

CURRENT HISTORY.

International Arbitration.

In another column a report of the conference at Washington will be found, as well as our opinion of the importance of the gathering and the subject considered. President Cleveland will soon have before him not only the resolutions of this important meeting, but a definite plan for the creation of an international arbitration tribunal, which has been drafted by the New York Bar Association, after consultation with some of the most eminent jurists of this and other countries. When it is remembered that the British House of Commons and our Congress are already on record as favoring such a settlement of all future differences between the United States and Great Britain, and when it is recalled how the spiritual leaders of Christendom have ranged themselves on the side of peace and put forth such utterances as we have cited from time to time since the year opened, it will be seen that a great step forward has been taken since those ominous last days of 1895, when Great Britain and the United States stood face to face with the prospect of war. And yet it will not do to overlook the fact that Lord Salisbury and Mr. Olney have made little progress toward a settlement of the question. The hope for a peaceful solution of this question lies in the good sense of the people of both countries, who will make short work of those who allow pride or technicalities to stand in the way of arbitration. Already there are indications that Lord Salisbury is soon to be superseded as director of the foreign policy of Great Britain by one of his own party who stands committed in favor, not only of the principle of arbitration, but a recognition of our right to hold and enforce the Monroe Doctrine. Sir Vernon Harcourt's questions in the House of Commons on Monday drew forth from Mr. Balfour the statement that both governments were working toward agreement on a plan for the arbitration of all differences. More definite details he declined to give.

Domestic Politics.

The drift of sentiment in the Republican party during the past week, as voiced by conventions in five States, has been decidedly unequivocal in its affirmation of loyalty to the gold standard and opposition to the free coinage of silver. Mr. McKinley has not been indorsed by the Republicans of Pennsylvania, Connecticut or Maryland, but will have pledged delegates from Virginia and Tennessee. That Mr. Reed has failed to secure the formal indorsement of Connecticut is something that would not have been predicted a few months ago. But he stands on a platform much nearer the views of the Connecticut Republicans than that which Mr. McKinley formulated in Ohio and he probably will receive the votes of most of the Connecticut delegates. Senator Quay's indorsement as a presidential candidate by the Pennsylvania convention and the terms in which the indorsement was made cause Republicans in other States, who have nothing but condemnation for Senator Quay's methods as a politician and his character as a man, to marvel at the action of their fellow-partisans.

The Democratic conventions of Rhode Island and Massachusetts have indorsed ex-Governor William E. Russell of Massachusetts as a suitable candidate for the presidency and declared in favor of a gold standard. Mr. Russell also has secured the indorsement of such an influential, independent journal as the New York Evening Post. The Alabama Democratic convention declared unequivocally for free coinage of silver by a vote of 331 to 173, and formally disapproved the financial policy of the administration; and the Nebraska Democratic convention, also, was controlled by the silver faction of the party and will send a delegation to Chicago headed by Hon. W. J. Bryan.

Louisiana has gone Democratic but by a very much reduced majority, and in New Orleans a combination of decent men supporting the Citizens' League ticket overturned the ring which has ruled and plundered the city for so many years.

The National Legislature.

The Senate has passed the Indian Appropriation Bill authorizing the expenditure of more than $9,000,000, a much larger amount than the House bill called for, and retaining the appropriations for Hampton Institute, Virginia, and the Lincoln Institution, Philadelphia. Senator Cockerell of Missouri was able to secure enough votes for an amendment which he offered providing for a gradual rather than a sudden withdrawal of the appropriations for sectarian schools, and our Roman Catholic brethren will have until July, 1898, to reconcile and adjust themselves to a withdrawal of all support, provided the action of the Senate is accepted by the House. Unfortunately Senator Platt of Connecticut failed to secure an appropriation for carrying on the work of the Dawes Commission. The House committee on new States has recommended that Oklahoma be admitted as a State. We may look for a favorable report on Alaska next week!

Temperance Legislation.

The appellate division of the New York Supreme Court affirms the constitutionality of the Raines Liquor Tax Law. It holds that the law is not a tax law, but is practically and essentially "an exercise of the police power of the State over a particular trade or business which from early times has been interdicted." It holds that legislatures in dealing with the liquor business must recognize patent facts, "such as that there are striking differences between the retail traffic in liquor in a great metropolis and in a remote rural neighborhood or even in separate parts of the same municipality." The opponents of the law have appealed to the Court of Appeals. A loophole in the law has been found by proprietors of saloons and restaurants and for the last two Sundays liquor has been sold more freely in New York city than at any time since Mr. Roosevelt and his fellow-commissioners came into power.

The proposition before the legislature of Massachusetts, for which many of the leading temperance organizations were contending, providing that all moneys collected by municipalities for license fees should b turned into the State treasury, has been d feated in the House by a vote of 88 yeas t 95 nays. The same body of legislators a one time bade fair to deprive the Stat Board of Pharmacy of the authority b means of which they have done such superio work during the past two or three years i weeding out those in the retail drug bus ness who persisted in keeping saloon But pressure was brought to bear last wee that induced the House to reverse its ac tion, and by a vote of 72 to 37 the order t repeal that portion of the law of 1894 whic gives the Board of Pharmacy entire contro of issuing liquor licenses to druggists wa lost.

The Crisis in France.

The fall of the Bourgeoise ministry wa brought about by the refusal of the Senat to grant credits for expenditures incurre in the conquest and government of Mada gascar, but it really was the last act in most significant and important contest be tween the conservative Senate and the radi cal Chamber of Deputies, which has bee going on for several months, in which th deputies have supported the ministry; an the situation which France faces now is no merely one involving the creation of a nev and more or less short-lived ministry, bu the grave question, whether in response t the clamor of the masses the national con stitution must be amended so that hereafte ministries will need only the approval o the lower house for their acts and be inde pendent of the restraining and conserv ing influence of the higher body, whos members are not representative of univer sal suffrage, but hold office for a long term —some of them for life—and are elected in directly and by a delegated body, repre senting the communes. The Senate, as a present constituted, has served as a brake and, on the whole, done well, often restrain ing the republic from dashing madly into all sorts of excesses. If the republic is to lose this anchor there are many in Europe who foresee disaster, and that soon.

Affairs in Africa.

A revolt among the Mahdists indicates that the British and Egyptian forces will not have to face a thoroughly harmonious foe. President Kruger of the Transvaal has declined the invitation of Mr. Chamberlain to visit England and negotiate there respecting reforms in the Transvaal and the future relations of the republic with Great Britain. This is not surprising in view of Mr. Kruger's reputation for astuteness and Mr. Chamberlain's recent impolitic denunciation of the Transvaal Government, nor has Mr. Chamberlain's reassertion of Great Britain's purpose to control, solely, the Transvaal's foreign policy tended to better the feeling between Great Britain and Germany, where, during the past week, there has been a decided revival of most belligerent talk; and the feeling increases that a conflict is approaching in South Africa, the outcome of which no one can predict save that Great Britain will face a determined foe, to subdue which will cost her more than she can afford to lose at this crisis of her history, for that there is a crisis An Eastern Diplomat makes very clear in the May Harper's. Several of the leaders in the rebellion against the Transvaal, including Sir Cecil Rhodes's brother, have pleaded guilty of treason and are awaiting punishment. The British troops in conflict with the Matabele Zulus have won a decided ictory and the outlook for the British colnists and troops in Matabeleland now is righter than it was ten days ago. Negoiations for a peaceful settlement of the ⁄ar between Italy and Abyssinia have ome to naught.

One of the largest figures in the political life f Australia has just passed away in the death f Sir Henry Parkes, who emigrated to Sydey in 1839, and served the colony of New outh Wales in various capacities, including hat of premier, from 1854 up to a year or two go.

While it cannot be definitely announced hat there is any likelihood of Spain's really ffering substantial reforms to Cuba, the rumors to that effect have brought forth such eclarations from the revolutionists as make clear that no measures of compromise will ffice, nor will any promises of reform be beeved or accepted, even should the United tates guarantee to see that Spain granted hem. Bishop Potter f New York, at a mass meeting in the interest f Armenia held in New York last week, made he important suggestion that the man whom hristendom should attempt to influence now s the czar of Russia, who, if he would, could ake his approaching coronation day glorious ndeed by acting as a Christian sovereign.

The statistics of the Massachusetts State census for 1895 are coming forth in final form from the Bureau of Statistics and Labor. The total population of the State is now 2,500,183. Gloucester is notable as being the only city where males are considerably in excess, and Northampton has the largest percentage of excess of females. In 1885 there were 108.19 females to 100 males, while in 1895 there were only 105.83 females to 100 males. Fewer towns have suffered a loss in population during 1885–1895 than during 1875–1885, and the actual net percentage of increase in the population of the State during the last decade is 27.73 per cent. as contrasted with a gain of only 17.57 per cent. during 1875–1885. The only towns which are decreasing are the remote agricultural communities and the shore towns, whose main reliance is the fishing industry. The concentration of population within the Greater Boston is proved by the fact that within the circle of eight miles from the State House the population has increased from 574,249 in 1885 to 787,822. Since 1885 nine towns have become cities and the thirty-two cities of the State have 65.42 per cent. of the population. These are interesting and most suggestive facts.

In affirming the unconstitutionality of the Veterans' Preference Act, passed by the legislature of 1895 over the veto of Governor Greenhalge, the Supreme Court of Massachusetts has done the cause of good government an invaluable service. By stating that:

Public offices are created for the purpose of effecting the ends for which government has been established, which are the common good and not the profit, gain or private interest of any one man, family or class of men. In our form of government it is fundamental that public offices are a public trust, and that persons to be appointed should be selected solely with a view to the public welfare . . . It is inconsistent with the nature of our Government, and particularly with Articles 6 and 7 of the Declaration of Rights, that the appointing power should be compelled by legislation to appoint to certain public offices persons of a certain class in preference to all others, and without the exercise on its part of any discretion and without the favorable judgment of some legally constituted officers or board designated by law to inquire and determine the persons to be appointed are actually qualified to perform the duties which pertain to that office.

the Court has shown that, like its peer in New York, it sees and indorses the essential principle underlying Civil Service Reform.

IN BRIEF.

Rev. Dr. P. S. Henson has begun the attack of conservative Northern Baptists on President Harper and Chicago University, which was bound to come sooner or later. The Southern Baptists began long ago.

Apparently the religion and ethics of Kentucky are not abreast of its political and industrial development. The Christian Observer (Presbyterian) of Louisville defends the Florida Sheats Law, and describes the American Missionary Association as the "American Miscegenation Society." And the Observer is one of the oldest and ablest of Southern Christian newspapers.

The many friends of Dr. Quint, who know him either through personal acquaintance or by his contributions to our columns, will sympathize with him in his latest and almost overpowering sorrow. His eldest child, Miss Clara G., who died suddenly in Washington April 20, was a woman of unusual strength of character, and had won the respect of public officials and leading citizens of Washington to a remarkable degree.

Mr. Winship's article on Horace Mann is timely, in view of the fact that educators in this country and to some extent abroad are preparing to recognize adequately the centennial of his birth May 4. The relations between Mr. Mann and the Boston Recorder were so strained at one time that it makes one speculate as to the probable expression on Mr. Mann's face as he picks up this paper in the New Jerusalem reading-room and reads Mr. Winship's article.

The advance figures of the Year-Book show the total number of churches to be 5,486, a gain of 144; members 602,000, a gain of 18,900; total admissions during 1895, 50,000, of whom 35,327 were on confession. The Sunday school membership is 682,000, a gain of 4,645 Benevolences amounted to $2,187,150. There was a gain for both foreign and home missions, but a slight loss in miscellaneous. Home expenses were $6,707,000, a decrease of $327,000.

Commander Booth-Tucker's remarks during his trip to the Northwest have alienated not a few officers of the Salvation Army and driven them into the ranks of the Volunteers, and the publication of the correspondence between General Booth and Ballington Booth has had a similar effect on some of the army's officers in the vicinity of New York. Nor can it be said to have added to the public's sympathy with the army. The army has reason to favor the gold standard, i. e., silence.

Having just celebrated our eightieth anniversary we appreciate the merits of the seventy-fifth anniversary number of the Christian Register, and realize better, perhaps, than its readers will, how much labor its preparation involved. President Tucker of Dartmouth contributes an article on New England orthodoxy, the development within the past seventy-five years. He holds that it matters little whether the so-called orthodoxy of New England is becoming more or less orthodox, provided the conception of Christianity is becoming more clearly and vitally Christian.

Rev. Joseph H. Twichell, in his tribute to his neighbor, Mark Twain, in the May Harper's, says: "One Sunday, when he [Twain] had happened specially to like the sermon he heard in church, he lingered at the door after service waiting for the minister to come out in order to give him a pleasant word, which he did in this fashion: "I mean no offense, but I feel obliged to tell you that the preaching this morning has been of a kind that I can spare. I go to church to pursue my own trains of thought. But today—couldn't do it. You have interfered with me. You have forced me to attend to you—and have lost me a whole half hour. I beg that it may not occur again."

One who recently left our fellowship to enter the Baptist denomination, when appearing before a Baptist Council in Minnesota, was met with the demand that he be reordained, and he assented. If this indicates anything more than the unwillingness of the members of that particular council to recognize the validity of the ordination of Congregational clergymen it would be well to have the fact made known and the reasons therefor. Drs. Behrends and Moxom—to cite recent prominent cases—left the Baptist communion and entered our fellowship without any such challenge, and we have always supposed the polities and principles of the two sects were so much alike that such action as this was impossible.

It is the same story the world over. The following words recently written by Dr. J. Guinness Rogers of London are just as pertinent in Boston, New York, Montreal and Melbourne as in London. He, in an appeal for a strong rally at the then forthcoming meeting of the London Congregational Union said:

Congregational churches are hindered in the work by that very independence which is their glory. The denominational sentiment—that is, a sentiment which knows how to subordinate the interest of the individual to that of the community — is indispensable to the vigorous prosecution of progressive work, and it is just the sentiment which it is difficult to maintain under the circumstances.

Congregationalists have attacked and partially solved the problem in St. Louis, Chicago and Cleveland. Why not elsewhere?

The New York Sun gives from the recently published memoirs an entertaining sketch of Sir Claude Champion de Crespigny, Bart., one of the most famous of modern English military sportsmen, who was known as the "Mad Rider." His favorite amusement was steeplechasing and he knew the English turf thoroughly. It is from an expert that we are quoting, therefore, and we commend his words to those who are disposed to make light of the perils which gambling brings into our modern society. "Rogues there doubtless are, and to spare, connected with horse-racing," he says. "It is inevitable that a sport so indissolubly connected with gambling should draw around itself a large crowd of blacklegs and pilferers. Indeed, it is perfectly safe to lay it down as a hard and fast rule that no sport or game in which betting is a feature can remain utterly uncorrupted." This is good sense and covers more than horse-racing.

Children in our public schools can be prepared for good citizenship in no better or easiser way than by having able speakers set before them the deeds and ideals of great Americans of the past, and lest the New England children become provincial it is well that they should be taught that deeds of heroism have been wrought in the West as well as in New England and by men whose names are not as familiar as those of Sam Adams and Paul Revere. Sixteen hundred pupils from the classical and English high schools of Lynn, with some from the upper grades of the grammar schools, last Wednesday heard Rev. John L. Maile describe how Oregon was saved to the Union by the heroism of Marcus Whitman. It is not rash to venture the assertion that the compositions based on the lecture which they wrote later in the week were more interesting and beneficial than if they had been written about spring or some other equally trite or platitudinous subject. The Christian people who arranged for the lecture set an example worthy of imitation by Christians in other communities. The secretaries of our denominational societies, as they travel about the country, can in this way do invaluable work, if the way is made clear.

One who reads The Congregationalist calls attention to a recent item, in News from the Churches, in which it was related that a Congregational pastor "prepared, during Lent, the confirmation class." He asks, "What is a confirmation class in a Congregational church, and what place has any rite of confirmation in our churches?" and adds, "It looks like an additional illustration of the ritualistic drift of our time . . . one feature of the anti-Puritan reaction." That such a question should be asked is not surprising, nor is the diagnosis far from correct. Another reader, taking our paragraph on Dr. D. Parker Morgan's plagiarism as a text, asks, "What would be one's duty in reference to an article by a prominent doctor of divinity which appeared in The Congregationalist a year or two ago, which consisted with the exception of a very few words of language from an article written by a very eminent man in England several years ago." A lie is a lie, whether it be a sermon or a contribution to a newspaper, and our correspondent would have done us a favor at the time, as well as performed a duty, if he had called our attention to and proved the plagiarism, and he will confer a favor if at any time in the future he proves a like charge. Rev. Mr. Lee, who exposed Dr. Morgan, is now found guilty of plagiarism when at Yale as a student.

Our editorial of last week on Pulpit Exchanges with Unitarians has called out the interesting letter from Dr. Cuckson of the Arlington Street Unitarian Church, Boston, which we print elsewhere in this paper. It is a pity that the first impulse toward Christian fellowship between followers of Christ of different opinions is often rendered difficult by the dread of popular misunderstanding. There is a broad field of activity in which co-operation is possible without any discussion of disputed theological questions, and here it becomes more and more necessary that all Christians should stand together in mutual love and trust for the honor of their Lord. We are sorry for the reporters of the Boston newspapers who were instructed to secure the materials for such a theological sensation from the exchange of pulpits between Dr. Hale and Dr. Herrick last Sunday. They went to church and heard two excellent and characteristic discourses, but not one word which even their ingenuity could distort into an allusion to a coming together of the denominations represented, and the managing editors were forced to crowd their sensation into windy headlines.

The Hartford Seminary Record (April) calls attention to what it terms the "morbid condition of our church life, which is tending oward an acute phase," and it believes, although with reluctance, that the root of the trouble lies largely with the ministers. "When fifty ministers crowd for one pulpit the church is forced to be obdurate and may seem cruel." How acute this disease, the symptoms of which are "uneasy pastors and unfeeling churches," is, may be inferred from a circular letter, a copy of which we have at hand. The pulpit supply committee issued it probably in self-defence. It certainly is not "unfeeling." It is frank, direct, businesslike, but not altogether pleasing as a phenomenon.

——, April —, 1896.

Dear Sir: Your letter of —— relative to supplying the pulpit of the First Congregational Church of this town was duly received and placed on file for future reference. The services of our pastor will end May 31, 1896. Negotiations for the settlement of a successor will be based on a salary of $1,200 per annun, and parsonage, which is rated at $300 per annum. Preachers supplying temporarily will be paid $20 per Sabbath, and local expenses.

If, with these explanations, you desire your papers withdrawn from the file kindly advise us at once.

Pulpit Supply Committee, ——, Secretary.

An exceedingly interesting controversy between the Protestant Ministerial Association of Montreal and the speaker of the House of Commons, and other responsible officials, is worth noting. The ministry, in their attempt to "jam"—"to jam" legislation through seems to be in order everywhere now—the Manitoba Remedial Bill through Parliament, compelled members to undergo the test of a sitting as long as any on record. The strain on mind and body proved too much for some of the members, and they indulged in acts and words which the Ministerial Association felt it necessary to condemn in resolutions which were not open to the charge of being unintelligible or equivocal. The speaker of the House of Commons and certain newspapers demanded that the ministers should withdraw their charges, expecting, apparently, some cringing, and ultimate retreat. But, strange to say, the ministers conceived it to be their duty to stand their ground, reiterate their charges and once more denounce the intoxicated legislators, the utterance of blasphemous remarks, and open ridicule of the Bible. The resolutions reaffirming the original charges have just been sent to the speaker, to Sir Charles Tupper, and to the leader of the opposition, Hon. Mr. Laurier. Moreover, the association added a protest against the action of one of the ministry in attempting to force legislation upon the attention of Parliament upon Sunday. Lest we be Pharisaical, let us not forget that two congressmen indulged in profanity la week, hurled glass inkstands at each othe one of them suffering serious injury.

Possibly the record—autobiographical—the experience of Principal A. M. Fairbai in facing and passing through a crisis whi not a few Christians also face today may h helpful. He says: "Our memories can, i many cases, run back to the days befo Darwin discovered the secret of nature, criticism laid its hand upon the Scriptur that were to us the sacred Word of Go We can remember the simple time whe thought seemed clear and faith seemed strong when before us was only hope and aroun mind and home lay sleeping sweet peace of God. We can remember when the ol faith stood in its simplicity and the s days of creation were six honest, simpl days; when all our history stood explaine in Adam and Eve and the apple. To man of us came the time when the old simplic ity vanished and new forces dissolved th world that looked so beautiful and seemed s true. How many a man can recall the mo ment—which I too can—when he felt as if al the world had changed, faith had perishe and hope was no more. It was then that great teacher first came to me to say, "Wha right hast thou to be happy? Learn thy dut and do it. Art thou afraid of the devil Take him by the horns and throw him and lo his strength is gone." The choice was made not to shut the eyes, turn back and hold through good and ill the ancient simple faith but with open eyes and clear mind to face the light if light it was, face the issue if issue there was to be, and know this, if God was then truth is, and, all truth being of God, to find it in any form, in any place, was still to find him."

STAFF CORRESPONDENCE.

FROM THE INTERIOR.

Ministers' Meeting

The meeting Monday was of more than ordinary interest. We had the privilege of listening to clear statement of the condition and needs of the Protestant churches in France. It was evident to all that no more promising field of missionary effort exists than is furnished today in France. The spirit of the Huguenots still survives and with sufficient encouragement and aid from England and America there seems to be no reason to doubt that France can in time be won for Protestant Christianity. We heard a few sad words from Rev. Mr. Bissell of India, who told us what the effect on the missions has been of cutting down appropriations in some instances fully forty per cent. It is very certain that when the time comes for collections in our churches the foreign missionary cause will be presented with unwonted earnestness.

The Congregational Club.

The meeting was held at the Auditorium. It was ladies' night. The attendance was not as large as it sometimes is, partly on account of the weather, partly, undoubtedly, because it was City Missions' night. The main address was by Dr. Noble on the mission and opportunity of Congregationalism in Chicago at the present time. It was a masterly presentation of a great subject. The character of the population, the growth of the city during the seventeen years Dr. Noble has been pastor of the Union Park Church, the absolute certainty that nothing but the gospel will save the city, were set forth with an emphasis not often heard. The address, as we believe, will mark an era in the history of city missionary work. Rev. J. F. Grob, who has recently come to

to take up work among the Germans, oke briefly on our mission to the Germans Chicago. He predicts success on ac- unt of the qualities of character which ese Germans possess. A very interesting d persuasive speech was also made by ofessor Mackenzie in behalf of the Wash- gton Park Church of which he is acting stor. The great need of this field is a ilding into which to gather the people o are flocking into this region by thou- nds. Altogether the evening was one of eat profit. With fifty-two churches al- ady organized by the City Missionary So- ety, and this while using more than half income in purely mission work from hich no pecuniary returns can ever come d where even spiritual returns are often w and meager, with over 5,000 members thered into these churches, with fifty- ir Sunday schools organized by its mis- onaries and more than 13,000 pupils in em, with nineteen young men from these urches persuaded to enter the ministry, ose who have studied the record of the ciety from year to year feel that in it we ve one of the best possible evangelizing encies. Its supporters believe in the urch as a divine institution, and in estab- hing churches just as fast as openings fer.

e Bible in Schools.

A little book entitled Readings from the ble Selected for Schools, prepared by mpetent persons representing different nominations, even the Roman Catholic, s been brought out by Scott, Foresman & . of this city, under the auspices of the icago Woman's Educational Union, for e in our public schools. [Reviewed in terary Department.] For a long time essure has been brought to bear on the oard of Education to restore the Bible to e schools. This, it is said, has been found practicable. It would seem as if the ok now prepared, an admirable little ork of its kind, might be used without jury to the feelings of any one. At any te, most of the ministerial bodies have titioned the Board of Education to intro- uce it, and many of the churches have nt to the board numerously signed peti- ons to the same effect. It is hard to see w any one can reasonably object to the hical instruction which might be imparted reading from such a book as this. It is ubtful if its introduction is secured, al- ough it is certain that a very large por- on of our citizens desire it.

e Case of Rev. F. B. Vrooman.

There are rumors of an appeal to the nod by certain brethren who have been willing that Rev. Mr. Vrooman, recently lled to the Presbyterian Church at Ken- ood, should be received into fellowship. o be sure, Mr. Vrooman has accepted the andards of the church and will undoubt- lly be bound by them in good faith. Such en as Dr. Withrow, Dr. Thomas C. Hall nd the more active ministers of the city oted to receive him, but Dr. Bryan of the hurch of the Covenant and perhaps some f the professors in McCormick Seminary em to be suspicious of heresy, or of irreg- larity in procedure, and so may succeed creating a case out of very small mate- als. As the synod is quite conservative ne action of Presbytery may be reversed. is said that Mr. Vrooman's case is simply n excuse for testing the real state of opin- on in the larger body of the church. Mr. Vrooman will not be installed as he had intended to be next Sunday. He will await the result of the appeal of the minority in the presbytery to the synod. Were he installed now he might be tried for heresy. As a member of another denomination he is not amenable to the Presbyterian Church courts. Meanwhile he will continue to supply the Kenwood Church.

The Cutters and Trimmers' Strike.

This has finally collapsed. The manufacturers consent to take back such of their old men as they need, one by one, but refuse to recognize the union. The union has voted to permit its members to go back on these terms. It is not certain whether the men are to be paid according to merit, as the manufacturers desired, or whether a minimum wage has been secured. The strike has been a foolish one. Neither party has gained anything by it. Mr. Debs has been invited to address the students of the University of Chicago in the near future and has accepted the invitation. Pains have been taken to circulate reports that the faculty were opposed to this. President Harper denies their truthfulness and declares that the wish of the faculty is that both sides of all questions be heard and that Mr. Debs will be treated as courteously as any other speaker.

Laymen in the Iowa Meetings.

In the two associational meetings recently held in northwestern Iowa laymen have taken a prominent part. This has long been desired. In Sioux Association a banker and an ex congressman read papers on political religious subjects to the edification of their hearers. They showed how the work of the churches is connected with the political welfare of the country. At the Council Bluffs Association Hon. N. P. Dodge gave a comprehensive and concise review of the work of the National Council at Syracuse, N. Y. The leading address on Sunday school matters at the coming meeting in May at Davenport will be given by a layman. In this new interest in the work of the church throughout the State no persons rejoice more than the ministers.

CURRENT THOUGHT.

AT HOME.

What must our Government do in Turkey? Christian Work says "the United States has a treaty with Turkey including the usual favored nation clause; it follows that its citizens have as good a right as the French to maintain missionaries in that country. That position we expect to see asserted and maintained by our Government; and in taking that position the Administration is sure of the united support of the people of the whole country." The Outlook "has no sympathy with pseudo-Americanism. It is opposed at all times to the defiant and warlike spirit. But, whatever the vices of Americans, they are not cowards, and if the country has to choose between the cowardly policy that palters and dallies and compromises with the unspeakable Turk, and the even Quixotic bravery which rushes in to defend the American flag and name from imaginary slights and humanity at large from real or fancied wrongs, it will prefer the second as the lesser crime of the two. In the name of America, and in the interests of its sacred honor, we demand of our Government a far more vigorous policy than it has thus far shown in defense of American life, property and rights in the land of the Crescent." The Independent says: "Our Government ought at this moment to be strengthening its fleet in the East; instead of that it is withdrawing its ships from Turkish waters. This looks like a blind infatuation, blind as that of Minister Terrell, who actually believes the promises of the Turk. Will not President Cleveland listen to the unanimous request of Americans in Turkey that their Government shall make itself respected because it is feared, the only motive that can appeal to the sultan? We call on the people of the United States to speak on the subject in such a way that first our own Government shall hear and then that it shall make the sultan hear. Congress has passed good enough resolutions; it is the Department of State that must do its duty. Let the press speak. Let the citizens speak in public meetings and by myriads of letters to their senators and representatives."

Zion's Herald says it is difficult to write temperately of so gross an outrage as the enforcement of the Sheats law in Florida. "The teachers at Cookman Institute, Jacksonville, one of the schools of the Freedmen's Aid and Southern Education Society, may be subjected to similar treatment under this law. It looks very much as if the struggle for the real emancipation of the Negro must needs be fought over again."

ABROAD.

An Eastern diplomatist, writing in the May Harper's on The English Crisis, says: "It is not within the province of this mere statement of facts to inquire into the probable outcome of a war between England and America. It would be a struggle of giants which would result for certain in crippling and exhausting both combatants for an indefinite length of time. Such a result would be fraught not only with ruinous consequences to their own immediate prosperity, but with long abiding disaster to the interests of civilization the whole world over. The two foremost leaders in progress, the guardians of liberty, the champions of the oppressed, the propagators of Christianity in modern times, would be laid low, and, being themselves reduced to impotence, would be compelled to allow free scope to those agencies whose illiberal, nefarious and retrograde tendencies they alone hold now in check."

The point of view makes all the difference in the picture. For instance, The Catholic News says, in regard to Italy and the Vatican:

> But a nation must not be confounded with her wily politicians. The husks of swine shall, we feel assured, lead the stricken land of Dante, Michael Angelo, Tasso and Leonardo da Vinci to climb anew, for the fiftieth time, the Vatican's ridge and exclaim honestly to her one true friend of all the ages: "Father! I have sinned against heaven and before thee." Then shall the seven-hilled city clamor aloud for Rome's own pontiff-king.

But Cav. W. L. Alden (late American consul-general in Rome) says in the April Nineteenth Century: "Like every one else, he [the present pope] knows perfectly well that were the temporal power to be restored it could not maintain itself an hour without the help of a foreign army. If the Italians were to abandon Rome to the pope, the Romans would rise in instant insurrection unless a French garrison were to walk in as the Italian troops marched out. Of all the governments in the peninsula prior to 1859, there was not one that was as unanimously and bitterly hated by its subjects as was the Roman Government." Evidently there has a myth been gathering somewhere.

The London Independent and Nonconformist states on the authority of a contributor that the average duration of the Congregational pastorate in Great Britain exceeds nine and a quarter years, and doubts whether an equally high average could be shown in any other ministry. We are sure that in this respect our brethren beyond sea are well in advance of us.

The Japanese press reflects a growing sentiment that Japan, by her acquisition of Formosa, has incurred responsibility for diminishing, if not suppressing, the traffic in opium in Formosa.

Certain Historic Creeds.

III. The Augsburg Confession.

By Prof. Williston Walker, D. D.

The two articles which have already appeared in this series have had to do with two of the three great creeds which the ancient church has bequeathed to us. A third article might properly treat of the third conspicuous ancient symbol—that known by the name of Athanasius, though this title no more rightfully belongs to it than the epithet Apostles' to the confession of the old Roman church, since it seems, without much doubt, to have been written in France and not far from the time of Charlemagne. But though the Athanasian symbol is a matchless epitome of the completed results of the long Trinitarian controversy, its value is as a statement of the conclusions of a minutely inquisitive type of theology, rather than as a simple and natural expression of the elements of Christian belief. Its claim that its definitions are "the catholic faith, which except a man believe truly and firmly he cannot be saved" is a claim foreign to the spirit of the gospel. We will therefore omit any extended examination of the Athanasian creed and turn our attention to the earliest of the great symbols of the Reformation.

In taking up any important creed statement of the sixteenth or seventeenth centuries one is struck at once by two contrasts to the symbols of the ancient church. Even the briefest of Reformation creeds is lengthy when compared with that of Nicæa. It is more like a treatise on theology than a formula adapted to liturgical use, and the range of doctrine in regard to which definition is attempted is vastly greater than in the creeds of antiquity. Though their crucial questions are few, the Reformation symbols have none of them the unspeculative simplicity of the Apostles' Creed, or the narrowly limited elaboration of the creeds known by the names of Nicæa and of Athanasius. The thought of the universal church had enlarged, the multiform character of Christian truth had become more apparent and more aspects of doctrine had attracted men's attention than in the early centuries. This greater elaborateness of inquiry is far from being an evidence of spiritual decay, on the contrary, it was the natural result of the development of the thought of the church under the guidance of the Spirit of God.

The Ausburg Confession came into being at one of the crises of the Reformation—the Diet of 1530. Twenty-five years before Luther had sought rest for his soul by entering a monastery. Fifteen years, at least, had already passed since Luther had awakened to his transforming conception of the way of salvation as the establishment of a new relationship between the individual soul and Christ—a relationship conditioned on trust, becoming itself the source of righteous actions and witnessing to an instant and complete forgiveness. Nine years had elapsed since Luther had stood before the emperor and the magnates of Germany, assembled at Worms, undaunted in his assertion of the superiority of Scripture and reason to all authority based merely on tradition and ecclesiastical interpretation, and had been condemned by the sovereign before whom he had spoken. Yet, though condemned, Luther had been protected by the public sentiment of Germany, and wars had so tied the hands of the emperor that the Reformation movement had gone on substantially unhindered till 1529, in spite of his hostility. This progress of the reform had no adequate legal warrant, however, and in 1529 the situation had suddenly altered for the worse. The Diet of April of that year had been under the control of an aggressive Catholic majority, and had peremptorily forbidden the further spread of the new views, while asserting the claims of the adherents of the ancient church in lands where the local governments had rejected Catholicism. Against this decree the adherents of reform had united in a remonstrance which gave to them permanently the title of Protestants. But this combination in protest was, unfortunately, the only union in which the reform party as a whole would join, and in October of the same year all hopes of an associated defense against the common danger were shattered by the irremediable division between Lutherans and Zwinglians as to the nature of Christ's presence in the sacrament. The summer had also seen the wars, that had so aided Protestantism politically, end with treaties between the emperor and his enemies, the king of France and the pope, which left Charles V. the most powerful sovereign in western Europe, while the repulse of the Turks from Vienna during the very days that Lutherans and Zwinglians were disputing at Marburg, relieved for the time being the peril which threatened the empire from the east. And when in January, 1530, the emperor, who had thus triumphed over his enemies and united all the Catholic forces of Europe, sent out the summons for the German Parliament to meet him at Augsburg, a divided Protestantism was certain to be brought face to face with an apparently reunited Catholicism to struggle for the right of continued existence.

The emperor was hopeful that the Augsburg Diet would unite Germany in military opposition to the Turks and restore religious peace to the divided country. A sincere Catholic, Charles V. was a shrewd enough politician to believe the true policy of opposition to the Reformation to involve a courteous hearing of the Protestants' grounds of complaint, though he doubtless intended ultimately to use force against such of the Protestant leaders as he should be unable to win back to the ancient church. He was also enough of a reformer to feel that many things in the moral condition and administrative methods of the Roman organization might well be amended, without permitting any change of doctrine. Hence, from the announcement that a Parliament was to be held, the Protestant leaders felt that they, as the innovators, would be required to justify their actions before the assembly, and the elector of Saxony therefore ordered Luther, Melanchthon and the other theologians within his territories to prepare a confession of faith for presentation should the emperor request a statement of Protestant belief. The materials for such a document were ready at hand. During the debate between the German and Swiss reformers at Marburg, to which allusion has already been made, Luther had stated the affirmative Protestant position in a series of fifteen articles, and this expression had been further modified by the L theran theologians preparatory to a seco vain attempt made at Schwabach to bri the Swiss to their position. Now, at the quest of the elector, in March, 1530, Luth Melanchthon, Jonas and Bugenhagen, form lated the Protestant criticisms of the mo objectionable Catholic doctrines at Torga and all these documents were committed the mild and cautious Melanchthon to brought into final form by his learned pe And so at Coburg, where Luther was forc to remain lest appearance at the Parliame should give occasion for the execution the sentence of outlawry and probab death that the Diet of Worms had pr nounced upon him in 1521, and at Augsbu itself, whither Melanchthon, who stood u der no such condemnation, was free to g the Augsburg Confession came into bein

Well was it that though the theology this statement of faith was that of Luthe it spoke the sweet and conciliatory languag of Melanchthon. The confession coul never have come into being had it not bee for the bold words and sturdy blows of th older reformer; it bears forever the stam of his thought and to some extent his for of expression. But Luther himself coul never have made it the moderate, kindl self-restrained formula which was so co genial to the nature of his younger co league. In Melanchthon's hands it re mained distinctly Protestant—it asserte clearly the doctrine of justification by faith it affirmed that "the church is the congre gation of saints, in which the gospel i rightly taught and the sacraments rightl administered"; it condemned the with drawal of the cup from the laity, priestl celibacy, the abuse of the mass and of con fession, man-imposed observances, monasti vows and the misuses of ecclesiastica authority. Yet, though fully Protestant Melanchthon sought to render the confes sion as little objectionable as possible t the German Catholics, and hence the exclu sive authority of the Scriptures, though un doubtedly implied in the doctrinal system of the symbol, was nowhere expressly as serted; and the authority of the papacy was nowhere categorically denied. Moreover, Melanchthon was at great pains to show that the Protestants rejected ancient here sies and to point out the agreement of Protestant doctrines not merely with the Word of God, but with passages in the teachings of fathers of the ancient church like Irenæus, Cyprian, Augustine, Ambrose and Gregory the Great, thus resting the confession back, in claim at least, on the fundamental teachings of Latin Christianity. Indeed, he expressly emphasized this relationship, affirming at the conclusion of his presentation of positive beliefs that "This is about the sum of doctrine among us, in which can be seen that there is nothing which is discrepant with the Scriptures or with the Church Catholic or even with the Roman Church, so far as that church is known from the writings of the fathers." It was an appeal for a return to the common Biblical foundation of the church.

The confession itself was divided into two parts—an affirmative section of twenty one positive articles of belief covering the chief features of Christian doctrine, and a much nger negative portion opposing in seven ticles the principle corruptions of Roman ractice. Its whole attitude was essenally defensive and irenic. In the minds its authors and signers of 1530 the Augsurg Confession was no unalterable test of octrine established for all time; it was a stimony to the actual beliefs of the Luheran churches, and, as such, Melanchon did not hesitate to amend its expresons not only up to the day of its presentaon to the Parliament, but in successive ditions for years thereafter. Yet its noral character was recognized almost from e first, and it soon became, as it has ever nce been, the most distinctive symbolic st of Lutheran orthodoxy.

The creed, thus carefully prepared by the axon theologians, was not to be presented the Parliament by theologians, but by rritorial rulers, who alone had a place in at body. The emperor's arrival at Augsurg on June 15 was followed by a formal pening of the assembly on the 20th, and y the expected call for a statement of beef. On the afternoon of June 25, 1530, in hall of the bishop's palace, to which the atholic emperor had restricted the meetg in order to avoid as far as possible the ide proclamation of Protestant doctrine, e confession was read to the Diet in German by Christian Baier, one of the chancelrs of Saxony, speaking in the name of its gners, the seven prominent Lutheran rinces, led by the elector of Saxony, the argrave of Brandenburg and the landgrave f Hesse, and the representatives of the free ties of Nuremberg and Reutlingen. It alled for no small courage thus publicly to ppose the well-known belief of the emperor nd of the majority of the Diet; it required mething of the brave trust in God which ad upheld Luther when he stood alone bere a similar assembly nine years before. et the greatness of a historic event is not lways apparent to all the actors in it, and ne may well question whether even the mperor's unfamiliarity with German would ave inclined him to go to sleep after potely listening to the opening phrases of ne confession had he realized that the symol then being read in his hearing would be ne only document ever presented in his resence which would still be in living use early three centuries and a half after his eath. The emperor and the majority of he Diet were unconvinced and remained in etermined hostility to the Lutherans, but he Protestant churches of the Lutheran amily had set forth on that June afternoon standard that was to endure.

The Lutheran churches may well be proud f the Augsburg Confession. It is not, indeed, the exact form of presentment of Bible truth which a modern Congregationalist would make his own. He would criticise its insistence on the necessity of baptism in order to salvation, its assertion of he physical presence of Christ in the sacament, its retention of private absolution, nd its conciliatory omissions. But he annot fail to sympathize with the catholic, noderate and discriminating spirit of this enerated symbol, and he will feel the more ne studies it that the Augsburg Confession deserves its position as the most widely espected creed of the Reformation, not merely because it is the earliest of the Reformation symbols, or by reason of its origin t a crisis in Protestant history, but because the beliefs which it emphasizes are, with few exceptions, the abiding and important, rather than the temporary, aspects of Christian truths.

HORACE MANN.

BY ALBERT E. WINSHIP, EDITOR JOURNAL OF EDUCATION.

Horace Mann is the one American among the educational leaders of the world. In the common acceptation of the term he was not a school man. His educational eminence was not due to the flash of genius like Rousseau's Emile, brilliant conception of educational ideals like Froebel's kindergarten gifts and occupations, or supreme devotion to children like Pestalozzi, but rather to the fact that his was a great personality devoting the twelve best years of life to official educational service.

Mr. Mann was by nature and training a philanthropist, statesman, orator, rather than an educator, but there were in his day other mighty men in each of those lines and his pre-eminence in education is due in no small degree to the fact that he is the only great philanthropist, statesman and orator who has officially and earnestly identified himself with education, and because of this fact his fame owes as much to education as the schools owe to him.

There is nothing tangible in our educational system, spirit or method to which we can point and say, "This is Horace Mann's monument." The nearest approach to this is the normal school and the teachers' institutes, and yet to him is largely due the credit for so far turning the tide from the private schools as to banish forever the old time idea that the public schools were for the masses and the private schools for the classes. This was only possible by rallying around him in his educational reform such social forces as Quincy, Rantoul and Salton stall, such rural respectability as Edward Dwight and James E. Carter, such statesmanship and eloquence as Everett and Burlingame, such philanthropic intensity as Channing and Theodore Parker.

To understand the significance of this change of sentiment we must glance at the educational history of Massachusetts. In 1642 the Massachusetts Colony took the most advanced educational position in the world, and in 1647 this position was made secure in legislation that is to this day the wonder of all students of history. In the conquest of a rugged soil and in self-preservation in the presence of warring, hostile tribes ideals were not realized. Local jealousies and human selfishness led slowly but surely to the complete degradation of the ideal common school into the basest political scheme for securing the slight advantage of selecting a local schoolma'am, or boarding the out-of-town schoolmaster, or furnishing unmarketable rubbish for fuel. This condition had reached its limit when the clash with the mother country came in 1763–83 and brought with it a sense of responsibility for the future manhood of the colonies. There was no possibility at that time of reforming the abuses in connection with the common schools, and the only hope was in the better education of the classes and of the few aspiring ones among the masses. The relief sought was in the academies which came with the Dummer Academy in 1763 and the Phillips Andover and Leicester Academies, which came with the close of the Revolutionary struggle, and ended with the sectarian seminaries and academies, which came in large numbers about 1820. This was a grand movement and its praises are yet to be adequately sounded. These institutions stimulated scholarly aspirations and furnished a higher type of teachers for the common schools. But they also developed caste lines, and when Horace Mann identified himself with education in 1837 almost as much money was expended by parents for the tuition of their children in private institutions as was raised by taxation for the support of all the public schools.

The reaction began in 1823 and culminated, as was supposed, in 1837, with the establishment of the State Board of Education and the selection of Horace Mann as its executive officer. The consequences no one could at that time foresee, but Mr. Mann, with intensity of purpose, nobility of spirit, grandeur of conception, brilliancy of administration, made and met a crisis with all antagonistic forces in Massachusetts and challenged the admiration of the world. Think of the reception given educational reports in this enlightened (?) age and then remember that Mr. Mann's reports were reprinted by other State legislatures—New York issuing an edition of 18,000 copies of the fifth report—by the British Parliament and translated and published by the German Government. Consider for a moment what prejudices England and Germany entertain regarding American institutions and how much more intense these were half a century since, and then the honor done Mr. Mann may be in part appreciated.

Horace Mann was one of the mighty men of 1840–60, the heroic period in modern America, and it was his privilege to write the emancipation proclamation for the common schools, and though the work of reconstruction is not even now accomplished, there has been, can be, no return to the former conditions Every improvement in appointments and appliances, every advance in construction of buildings and beautifying of grounds, every modification in method and new thrill in spirit is but the perfection of the reconstruction which was foreshadowed in the emancipation proclamation of Horace Mann.

THE INTERNATIONAL ARBITRATION CONFERENCE.

BY LILLIAN CAMP WHITTELSEY.

Amid the exciting war talk of the winter the idea of international arbitration has been stimulated and has just crystallized in the notable conference held in Washington, D. C., last week, which ex-Senator G. F. Edmunds said in his opening speech was the most remarkable gathering that the civilized world has ever seen. "Not that the thought of arbitration is new," he added, "any more than the Lord's Prayer and the Ten Commandments are new."

No one can tell how the idea started any more than he can detail the impulse that shows itself in leaf and bloom. But in this they are alike, the divine thought is in both. Chicago, Boston and Philadelphia and other cities celebrated Washington's Birthday, 1896, by meetings in the interest of arbitration between the two great English-speaking powers. The International Conference is an outgrowth of these meetings. Metzerott Hall, where the sessions were held, seats about 1,000, and for this occasion was draped with flags and the platform backed and flanked by masses of palms. A good-sized pamphlet handed out in the lobby had this inscription, "To her Majesty the Queen and to the President of the United States." It gave a synopsis of responses to the call sent out for the conference; they came from churches, clubs, boards of trade, army organizations, etc. A smaller booklet labeled Opinions, giving many endorsements of the idea by prominent men who could not be present, also was distributed. The number of those who left the pulpit, the sanctum, the classroom, the law office, the business house showed how intense and how intelligent is the interest. The registry of delegates the first day was over three hundred, and they came from forty-six States and Territories.

Mr. Gardner G. Hubbard of this city called the conference to order. He is a wealthy man, who gives his time and money freely to patriotic, scientific and literary matters, and has made the capital his debtor by the development of its best life. With him upon the platform was the accomplished diplomat, ex-Secretary J. W. Foster, clear-cut of face and figure. He was made temporary chairman, and the second day gave a reception to the conference at his handsome home. Ex-Senator G. F. Edmunds was chosen permanent chairman, and made a short, forcible speech when he took the chair. His brown hands and ruddy complexion show the effect of outdoor life, and his keen blue eyes light up his wintry face as of old. He is a stern and correct presiding officer; the first thing he did was to remove a huge vase of roses from the desk, and he soon made a suggestion that as this was a business meeting applause would better be omitted.

Edward Everett Hale, the author of A Man Without a Country, had come in the interest of all countries. He sat apart as if absorbed. The shape of his head and his long brown hair remind one of the pictures of Tennyson. Mr. Carnegie sent a check for $1,000 with a letter, which was read by the secretary, Rev. L. F. Chamberlain, D. D., of New York. Dr. Chamberlain has been untiring in his labors for this conference and seemed the wheelhorse of the occasion. The practical result of such a conference depends much upon its committee on resolutions. The naming of this committee was left with the chairman, but Mr. Edmunds insisted that with such an embarrassment of riches in the way of material the number must be defined. Eleven was considered too small, thirteen was dropped as an unlucky number, and fifteen decided upon. They were given twenty-four hours in which to report, and all resolutions and motions were referred to them. This cleared the way for speech making, the subject taken being War versus Arbitration, the disadvantages of the one, the desirability of the other. There were incidentally some flings at Congress, criticism of our navy, and much adulation of the mother country.

President Gates of Amherst, always thoughtful and scholarly, read an excellent paper answering the question, Why Should We Have a Permanent Tribunal? Mr. E. V. Smalley, a well-built, sensible looking man, spoke from his large experience as a journalist. He said the United States should have arbitration, not because she is weak but because she is young and strong; and because she wishes to enter the contest for the commercial supremacy of the world.

When Gen. O. O. Howard came upon the platform there was much clapping of hands. Senator Edmunds referred to him as a man who loves peace, and then pointing to his empty sleeve said, "But he knows something of war as well." Then there was more applause, for no one so touches men's hearts as the hero of many battles. The general made one of his characteristic short talks, full of patriotism and manliness.

"Did you ever see so many bald heads together?" said my neighbor in the gallery. I certainly never saw so many wise ones. The subject of war, for instance, was one of experience to most of the delegates. From the serene hights of advancing age many of these men welcome the advent of a universal peace. Can the young men of the nation, those who are keen to see insults and quick to resent wrongs, be made to view war and rumors of wars in the same light?

The creation of public sentiment being the main object of the meeting, the speakers for the evening sessions were carefully chosen. Hon. Carl Schurz is as lithe and active, his hair is as brown and bushy, and his German brogue as effective as twenty years ago. He dresses, too, in much the same style, black coat, white waistcoat and light trousers. His enthusiasm for America comes out in many patriotic sentences sure to win applause. Mr. Edward Atkinson of Massachusetts, a close student of economic conditions, craved the sympathy of his audience. "Once," he said, "I was called upon to follow Mr. Gladstone, now I am asked to speak after Carl Schurz." He deprecated war and extolled peace, stated that 2,000,000 farmers here depend for their living upon European markets, while 40,000,000 over there look to this country for material for bread. He would have reciprocity upon the high seas, and would build no more commerce destroying cruisers. President Angell of Michigan University, with his smooth, pleasant intonations, perfect English and clear statements, was restful and yet stimulating.

The great meeting of the series, in point of numbers, was the closing one Thursday evening at the Grand Opera House. The house was packed and there was no going out between the acts. The boxes were filled with handsomely gowned ladies and scholarly looking men. From the upper tier President Gates and General Howard looked directly down upon the boards. Senator Edmunds's black skull cap was the only "make-up" to be discovered by the scores of opera glasses leveled at the stage. Around him were seated those whose names I have mentioned, with Charles Dudley Warner, handsome and aristocratic, the white-haired but still fiery Randolph Tucker of Virginia, and others. President Eliot of Harvard, Bishop Keane, dean of the Catholic University, and President Patton of Princeton spoke. Senator Edmunds gave elaborate introductions and the gentlemen had made careful preparation. But Cardinal Gibbons could not come and Mr. Chauncey Depew sent his regrets and there was a little feeling of disappointment.

The resolutions reported by the committee and adopted by the conference follow. They were expanded at the suggestion of Mr. Edmunds so as to recommend the extension of the area of the authority of arbitration "to all civilized nations," and at the earliest possible day. Mr. Edmunds is chairman of the committee which will lay these resolutions before President Cleveland. A permanent organization is to be created by a select committee of twenty-five. Here are the resolutions as reported:

This national conference of American citizens, assembled at Washington, April 22, 1896, to promote international arbitration, profoundly convinced that experience has shown that war, as a method of determining disputes between nations, is oppressive in its operation, uncertain and unequal in its results and productive of immense evils, and that the spirit and humanity of the age, as well as the precepts of religion, require the adoption of every practicable means for the establishment of reason and justice between nations, and considering that the people of the United States and the people of Great Britain, bound together by ties of a common language and literature, of like political and legal institutions, and of many mutual interests, and animated by a spirit of devotion to law and justice, have on many occasions by recourse to peaceful and friendly arbitration manifested their just desire to substitute reason for force in the settlement of their differences and to establish a reign of peace among nations; that the common sense and enlightened public opinion of both nations is utterly averse to any further war between them; some good sense re-enforced by common principles, by amity, religion and justice, requires the adoption of a permanent method for the peaceful adjustment of international controversies, which method shall not only provide for the uniform application of principles of law and justice in the settlement of their own differences, but shall always promote peace, progress of all peoples, does hereby adopt the following resolutions:

1. That in the judgment of this conference, religion, humanity and justice, as well as the material interests of civilized society, demand the immediate establishment between the United States and Great Britain of a system of arbitration.

2. That it is earnestly recommended to our Government as soon as it is assured of a corresponding disposition on the part of the British Government to negotiate a treaty providing for the widest practicable application of the method of arbitration to international controversies.

3. That a committee of this conference be appointed to prepare and present to the President of the United States a memorial respectfully urging the taking of such steps on the part of the United States as will best conduce to the end in view.

THIRTY CANDIDATES.

BY EDGAR L. WARREN.

Some time ago I received a call from a little home missionary church to another field, which in the providence of God I felt called on to accept. I was very anxious that my church secure a successor without delay, in order that there might be no break in the work. I had in mind a man eminently fitted for the place, who was willing to come, and he would have been called and begun at once had it not been for a circumstance upon which neither the church nor myself had counted.

As soon as it was announced in The Congregationalist that I had received a call, letters began to come in from far and near. In one week thirty were received. They came from all over New England and as far west as Nebraska. Some of them were from men who had held positions that paid them $2,500 a year. And they continue to come. Every mail brings two or three applications. The clerk has given up trying to answer them as an impossible task.

Such a condition of affairs is demoralizing to churches and pastors. It cheapens the ministry. Churches cannot have the reverence for the profession which they should have when there is such a scramble for places. Ministers cannot have that manly independence which should characterize them when they feel so uncertain about the future. When there are so many available candidates a church is not going to have the patience with a minister that it otherwise would.

The time has come to take some measures to remedy the evil. The ministry should be harder to get into. Before a young man enters a seminary he should be examined by some association of ministers to see if he is a suitable candidate for such a high office. Weak men and men with imperfect preparation should be weeded out.

Ministers of other denominations who think of coming over to us should be told candidly in advance what to expect. If they come from conscientious motives, because they think they can serve God better with us than where they are, we will welcome them and share with them. There shall be one law for the stranger and for the home born. But if they are influenced by a desire to better their condition they should hesitate. I know men who come into our denomination from other bodies who tell me that if they had known as much in advance as they do now they would never have made the change. They tell me they would go back tomorrow if it were not for pride.

Ministers of our denomination who have churches should be very patient. There is no such thing as an ideal church. Each field has its drawbacks and discouragements. It is better to bear the ills we have than fly to others that we know not of. I know one man who resigned his pastorate who has been out of a place for two years, another three. It is almost impossible to find a place under a year. If ministers would realize this fact and settle down where they are to make the best of things, they would escape a great deal of restlessness and be as well off in the end.

"THIS DO IN REMEMBRANCE OF ME."

When the Paschal evening fell
Deep on Kedron's hallowed dell,
When around the festal board
Sat the apostles with their Lord,
Then his parting word he said,
Blessed the cup and broke the bread—
"This whene'er you do or see Evermore remember me."

Years have passed; in every clime
Changing with the changing time,
Varying through a thousand forms,
Torn by factions, rocked by storms,
Still the sacred table spread,
Flowing cup and broken bread,
With that parting word agree,
"Drink and eat—remember me."

When by treason, doubt, unrest,
Sinks the soul, dismayed, opprest,
When the shadows of the tomb
Close us round with deep'ning gloom,
Then bethink us at that board
Of the sorrowing, suffering Lord,
Who, when tried and grieved as we,
Dying, said, "Remember me."

When through all the scenes of life,
Hearths of peace and fields of strife,
Friends or foes together meet,
Now to part and now to greet,
Let those holy tokens tell
Of that sweet and sad farewell,
And in mingled grief or glee
Whisper still, "Remember me."

When diverging creeds shall learn
Towards their central Source to turn,
When contending churches tire
Of the earthquake, wind and fire,
Here let strife and clamor cease
At that still, small voice of peace—
"May they all united be In the Father and in me."

When in this thanksgiving feast
We would give to God our best,
From the treasures of his might Seeking life and love and light,
Then, O Friend of humankind,
Make us true and firm of mind,
Pure of heart, in spirit free—
Thus may we remember thee.

—Dean Stanley.

To a friend who expressed pleasure at the advance of spring an anxious mother replied: "All my personal enjoyment is spoiled the minute outdoor sports begin. I'm in constant terror lest the boys will be killed when riding their bicycles or drowned during the swimming season." It is a pity that all such solicitous souls could not adopt the sweet Christian philosophy of Ole Bull's grandmother. When asked how she could rest when he and his little brothers were scaling cliffs or sailing their boats on the dangerous Norwegian fjords, she said: "Why, my dear, if we sent nurses after each one what would their guardian angels have to do?" It is desirable, of course, that children should have the causes of danger in their sports and games explained to them, but, fortified with an intelligent understanding of these causes, they must be left free to encounter the ordinary risks connected with physical exercise.

The alcohol habit among women belonging to what is called the best social circles is alarmingly on the increase. In confirmation of this statement is the fact that the percentage of arrests for drunkenness among the lower classes of women shows little variation for twoscore years. But physicians admit that among their patients are a considerable number of wives and mothers in wealthy and respectable homes who are sad dipsomaniacs, or else addicted to the opium habit. The establishment of private hospitals for this class of inebriates is another proof that the evil is greater than many suppose. One cause of this deplorable tendency, says a visiting physician in one of the New York hospitals, is the prevalence of nervous degeneration among American women. Another cause assigned is the alleged decay of the religious sentiment nowadays among women. But whatever the cause the condition points to the need of reconstructing some of our social habits, such as using French liqueurs at ladies' lunch parties, as a part of our temperance reform.

FRANKNESS BETWEEN FRIENDS.

BY MARGARET E. SANGSTER.

Friendship at its best is the most educational experience possible to men and women, for, since by its very existence it demands and implies reciprocity of sentiment and mutual obligation, in every friendship worth the name there is a continual leading out of self and a continual growth toward excellence.

No real friendship, flawless as a gem and spherical and serene, can be maintained in dignity and aspiration to the highest ideal where the parties to it are afraid for any reason to be entirely sincere with one another. If, for any cause, there is conscious hedging by this one and fencing by that, if at times one friend or the other approaches thin ice in the familiar intercourse, and mentally looks out for a danger signal, the friendship is incomplete and fails of attaining its highest plane.

It is not so much that a friend desires to invest a friend with all lovable and beautiful qualities, as that the qualities themselves have brought about the friendship and are taken for granted as fragrance and warmth and sunshine and atmosphere are taken as of course in these sweet spring days. Friendship is founded on congeniality; it can only live where there are fitness and responsiveness. In its varying degrees it may sometimes bind the younger very closely to the older, the unlearned to the scholarly, the toiling to the affluent, but unless in exceptional cases it reaches its best expression where environment and intellectual conditions are favorable and to some extent equal. There must be kinship of mind and communion of interest to begin the friendship. For its growth, propinquity, a common faith, reverence for the individuality of each on the part of both and an unstudied altruism are probably essential. In the strongest friendship there is jealousy, not of the mean and base sort which is an exaggeration of self-love and lies in wait for offense, but of the pure and noble kind which exacts from the beloved one that which is worthy his best endeavor, which can accept nothing half-hearted and nothing trivial in a friend's thought and performance.

The friendship which is at once a personal offering and a rejoicing in the finest development of the friend will not hesitate at the truth, nor build itself on anything lower than the truth. Entire candor between friends supposes in them a nobility which does not cry for compliment and praise, but which does claim and appreciate sincerity. Not the childish and petulant phrase, "Tell me my faults and I'll tell you yours," is meant in this relation, but the instant answering of soul to soul in an outgo of never-ceasing helpfulness.

Such a friendship may exist between man and man, or between woman and woman, or, perhaps oftenest, between man and woman. When, in the latter case, it reaches its fullest flower of beauty in marriage, it becomes a type and symbol of that divine harmony which subsists between Christ and the church. Husband and wife must be friends in the truest sense if their marriage is to mean what heaven intends marriage to be, the most of heaven which can be bestowed on earth and expressed in an earthly home. But friendship is not necessarily a thing of sex, it is a thing of soul. Two men, loving one another as men can love, clinging to one another through all vicissitude, believing in one another and holding one another sternly to the best, by reason of their love, realize such fullness of devotion as the Bible sets forth in the idyl of David and Jonathan. Nay, did not our Lord himself, yearning for human sympathy, among his disciples select one who has come down through the age as "that disciple whom Jesus loved"? What a beautiful distinction and how suggestive to every Bible student, showing into what secret of the Lord some may enter, leaning on Jesus' bosom.

Friendship of woman for woman is so common, yet so rare and so blessed, at its best, that we forget to eulogize it among life's finer forces. Everywhere it exists, everywhere it shows how firm and loyal and generous and long-tenured the pleasant relation may be. We find it in literature and in history, but we need not go there to look for it, since examples of it are in our own village, in our own street, in our own church. Free from petty self-seeking, above all vanity, united in endeavor and strong in the same hope for this world and the next, the friendships of women go on from childhood to gray hairs.

Between friends, of whatever degree, let there be the assurance of perfect candor. Part of the price must never be kept back. We shall love one another more, not less, if we give at times the helping hand and say the word which means disillusion for the moment only, that in the next there may be clearer knowledge, the cobwebs swept away, and the sunshine pouring its light into every corner of the soul.

PHOEBE.

BY HELEN A. HAWLEY.

It is doubtless true that most persons would like to live here after they die. That is, they would prefer not simply to exist for a generation or two in the memory of their friends, but to leave a name treasured through centuries. Not that all consciously cherish such a desire, but if the possibility appeared the dormant wish would spring into conscious being.

There was one woman who attained this distinction, probably never thinking about it, simply doing her duty and living out one word. Her memorial is short, the length of the record is only a sentence and the one word which tells her work is—succorer. I cannot say positively, but I think she was an unmarried woman and that, the ties of home and children being denied to her, she laid the life which perhaps to herself seemed dwarfed at the feet of her Lord, humbly asking him to use it for his glory. The answer of his providence was to make her a servant of the church at Cenchrea, not exactly as we use the word servant, but in the nobler sense often found in the Bible. Doubtless she went about among the poor and the sick, distributing money or food—the alms of the church—taking to others what they needed more than money, kind words, help over hard places. One can see her kneeling in prayer at sickbeds or beside the tempted. I think the maidens went to her with their love secrets, because she was still young at heart, perhaps because in her own heart was a pain which the years of maturity had not quite deadened.

To succor is to help. Her helpfulness overflowed. She did not wait for a great opportunity or for some great personage. "She hath been a succorer of many," then St. Paul modestly adds, "and of mine own self." What did she do for him? Who can tell? Perhaps she fed him when he was hungry, or mended his clothes, worn and travel stained, or did some such humble kindness. Perhaps she gave the higher help of a brave, courageous spirit, comforting "those that are cast down" as he sometimes was. It is possible they talked over his public utterances and she put in her word of approval. For St. Paul was not above the need of human sympathy.

Did she know then what a great man St. Paul was? Probably not. Did she dream that his few words commending her to the friends at Rome would live and be read every year by thousands through long centuries? No. She was simply in the business of helpfulness, and Paul came in for his share, along with the humblest member of Christ's body. It is safe to say if she had not helped the many she would not have known how to serve him. A cheap road to immortality? Hardly, unless it is easy to put aside selfish comfort, but an open road certainly, and one which need not of necessity turn aside from the common course of life because every day brings the opportunity. Despise not the little ways, the "many," in looking for the possible Paul. He may never come, but the many will.

How shall one enter on the business of a succorer? By first going with our own troubles, as Phœbe doubtless did, to the great Succorer, "that we may be able to comfort them that are in any affliction, through the comfort wherewith we ourselves are comforted of God." The wisdom necessary? From the same source. "Let him ask of God." And money? "He that supplieth seed to the sower and bread for food, shall supply and multiply your seed for sowing." There is no record that Phœbe was a rich woman, but rather the contrary, for St. Paul asks the Roman friends to "assist her in whatsoever matter she may have need of you." It looks as if she gave herself, just as you or I may do, and God used the gift to succor many. And immortality? Certainly. Don't think about it, but it will come. A name written even on earth in the grateful hearts of others, better still in lives made happy and noble because succored instead of hindered, in such lives going on to help other lives; written, too, in God's book of remembrance, where perhaps one day the universe may read.

BLOODROOT.

When mid the budding elms the bluebird flits,
As if a bit of sky had taken wings;
When cheerily the first brave robin sings,
When timid April smiles and weeps by fits—
Then dainty Bloodroot dons her pale green wrap,
And ventures forth, in some warm, sheltered nook,
To sit and listen to the gurgling brook,
And rouse herself from her long winter nap.
Give her a little while to muse and dream,
And she will throw her leafy cloak aside,
And stand in shining raiment, like a bride Waiting her lord; whiter than snow will seem
Her spotless robe, the moss-grown rocks beside,
And bright as morn her golden crown will gleam.

THOMAS JEFFERSON.

BY JEANNETTE A. GRANT.

"After Washington he was the best chief magistrate of a republic the world has ever known, and in some material particulars he surpassed Washington."—James Parton.

Among the papers of the great Jefferson were found directions for a simple monument to mark his resting place. Upon it he wished inscribed those deeds by which he desired "most to be remembered." From all his many claims upon posterity's regard he chose but three: that he was the author of the Declaration of American Independence and of the Statute of Virginia for Religious Freedom, and father of the University of Virginia. By the first of these he made himself known wherever a heart beat more quickly at the thought of human wrongs, but to appreciate the humane side of the other two it is necessary to know the early history of religious and educational progress in the colony of Virginia. Jefferson found in his native State a wide field for his love of fair play for all, and he worked patiently and with wisdom until success came.

Thomas Jefferson was born April 13, 1743, on his father's plantation in Albemarle County, Virginia. Peter Jefferson, his father, was a man of great physical strength and corresponding character and intelligence. By his own efforts he secured a home in what was then a wilderness, and, after working for two years to clear his fields and prepare a house, he brought to it his young wife, Jane Randolph, the daughter of a wealthy tobacco planter on the James River. She was born in London, and the new home was named Shadwell in honor of the parish where she saw the light. The young couple rode fifty miles on horseback on their wedding journey to their home. From both parents Thomas inherited good qualities and refined tastes.

Peter Jefferson made early arrangements for the physical and mental culture of the son who was to become so distinguished a man, but whose greatness his father was not destined to see, for when the boy was fourteen the noble father suddenly died, leaving a dying request that his son's education should be completed. In after days Jefferson described himself as left "without a relation or friend qualified to advise or guide" him. But the lad went to work in good earnest to carry out his father's wishes.

At the age of seventeen he entered the curiously managed College of William and Mary, situated at Williamsburgh, then the metropolis of Virginia. Though only an unpaved village with one long street and some 200 houses, Williamsburgh was the scene of all the pomp and pageantry of the old Virginia gentry. There was every opportunity for a young man to fritter away his time, and the college itself, in endeavoring to follow the directions of its various benefactors, was, as Parton calls it, "a medley of college, Indian mission and grammar school, ill governed and distracted by dissensions among its ruling powers." But young Jefferson knew what he wanted and became the companion of the most enlightened member of the faculty, from whose conversation he derived extreme advantage. With his splendid health the young student was able to devote long hours to his studies, working fifteen hours a day at times and for exercise taking only a run out of the town at twilight. Even his dearly loved violin, upon which he was a skillful performer, received but a few moments instead of the accustomed three hours of daily practice. With its dignified young master, however, it went once a week to the musical parties given by the elegant and accomplished Governor Fauquier.

At the end of two years Jefferson had decided to leave the college and begin reading law at home. The law books of that time were antiquated and dull and the laws were unnecessarily severe. But at his home he found many things to vary the monotony of his studies. He took charge of his father's farm, as he did everything all through his life, cheerfully, faithfully and with great intelligence. Various family events took place in the home, among them the marriage of his sister Martha to his dear school friend, a rising young lawyer, Dabney Carr, destined a few short years afterward to die and leave his young widow and little children to the tender care of Thomas Jefferson. The death of his dearly loved sister Jane occurring shortly after the marriage of his friend was another event that brought sorrow to his heart.

The years of Jefferson's young manhood were stirring times in the history of our country. Among his intimate friends, all of them famous men, was young Patrick Henry, who astonished the world by his eloquent speech against the Stamp Act in the Virginia House of Burgesses in 1765. Jefferson stood in a doorway and listened, and from that hour his country's good was the aim of his life. In 1767, when he was twenty four years of age, Jefferson was admitted to the bar of Virginia. He was well equipped both by nature and culture to prove a good lawyer, and the times gave plenty of opportunity to secure cases, for the financial affairs of the colony were in a sadly muddled condition.

In 1769 Jefferson became a member of the legislature of his native State and the same year he began that beautiful home at Monticello into which he wrought so much of sentiment and love of the beautiful. For there was a most delightfully sentimental side to his character, as any one may see who gives himself the pleasure of reading the private letters of Jefferson. The story of his domestic life at his beloved Monticello is pathetic and beautiful. In later years, after he had retired from public business, he was visited there by many celebrated people, to whom he was ever a delightful host.

In June, 1776, the Continental Congress, assembled at Philadelphia, appointed five of its members to prepare a suitable statement of the fact that Great Britain's American colonies considered themselves free and independent. Jefferson was chairman of this committee and the other four members were John Adams, Benjamin Franklin, Roger Sherman and Robert R. Livingston. Jefferson's skill as a writer and his thorough understanding of the matter caused his to be the pen that wrote the famous Declaration of Independence, and although the Congress spent three days in pulling his composition to pieces and making various changes it was finally adopted and on July 4 indorsed by those immortal signatures so well known in facsimile. John Hancock, as he wrote his name in great, brave characters, declared that John Bull could read it without his spectacles.

Through various public offices of high estate Mr. Jefferson at length came to the presidency. On March 4, 1801, plainly dressed and alone, he rode to the Capitol on horseback, walked in calmly after hitching his horse to the palisades and delivered his inaugural address. The public events of his two terms as President are fully recorded in the history of the United States.

On the Fourth of July, 1826, surrounded by his loving family, the "Sage of Monticello" passed to his reward.

OUR NATIONAL FLOWER.

A renaissance of interest in the question of a national flower for America has started a movement in favor of the columbine. Among the practical reasons urged for its adoption is its wide distribution, as it grows wild in every State in the Union, with the exception of a small region about the Lower Mississippi, and even there it could be propagated easily from the seed.

From the standpoint of patriotism and sentiment many arguments are adduced in its favor. The very name suggests Columbia, and Columbus in Spanish means dove, which recalls the fact that he, like Noah's messenger of old, brought back tidings of a new-found world. Its botanical name, aquilegia, is even more poetical in its suggestiveness. It is derived from aquila, an eagle, on account of a fancied resemblance, when the flower is reversed, to the talons of an eagle. These two symbols, the dove and the eagle, are a fitting symbol of Columbia's attitude toward other nations. Furthermore, a front view of the flower shows the outline to be a beautiful five-rayed star, a single petal of one of the long-spurred forms is shaped exactly like a horn of plenty, significantly characteristic of this fruitful land, and the leaf lobes are frequently thirteen in number, corresponding to the stripes in our flag.

In addition to these advantages artists claim that the columbine is particularly well adapted to decorative purposes, and this is important if we desire to use our national flower in conventional designs as the English use the rose, the French the fleur-de-lis and the Japanese the chrysanthemum.

Altogether this graceful, modest and yet hardy little blossom, which may be found in almost every conceivable color, is a strong candidate for popular favor. A Columbine Association has been formed in Boston, and application cards for membership can be obtained by sending one cent to the secretary, James S. Pray, P. O. Box 2774. A payment of ten cents, after receiving the card, entitles one to membership in the association.

I hold him great who, for love's sake,
Can give with generous, earnest will—
Yet he who takes, for love's sweet sake,
I think I hold more generous still.
—Adelaide Proctor.

FOR SUNDAY AFTERNOONS.

To most Christians the value of communion Sunday is enhanced by setting apart an hour or more for reading and meditation on this most tender and impressive feature of our church service. As a help in thus centralizing one's thoughts we suggest these few choice selections of both prose and poetry which emphasize the idea of Christ as the Bread of Life:

The Children of the Lord's Supper. Longfellow.
Communion. Susan Coolidge.
Our Daily Bread. } Lucy Larcom.
At the Feast. }
Heaven Within. Matthew Arnold.
Thomas à Kempis on the Holy Communion in his Imitation.
As It Is In Heaven. Lucy Larcom. Chapter entitled The Blessed Need.
The Indwelling Christ. James Campbell. Chapter on The Real Presence.
The Upper Room. Ian Maclaren.

The memorizing of hymns, too, is a great quickener of spiritual life and the few facts which we append concerning three that are familiar to all may add to the pleasure of committing them to memory:

I love to steal awhile away.

This was composed by a Mrs. Brown. She had many cares and her heart was heavy with a great sorrow. She could not have quiet communion with God in her own home, and made it a practice to retire to a grove near her house every evening, whenever it was possible, for prayer and meditation. After one of these seasons of sweet communion with the Master she wrote this hymn, which has brought so much comfort to many a heart.

God moves in a mysterious way.

This was one of the many grand and consoling hymns composed by William Cowper. In hypochondria he resolved to take his own life, and rode to the river Thames, but found a man seated on some goods at the very point from which he expected to spring. He rode home and that night threw himself upon his own knife, but the blade broke. He then hanged himself to the ceiling, but the rope parted. No wonder when God so mercifully delivered him from that awful dementia that he sat down and wrote this memorable hymn!

Abide with me.

A melancholy interest is attached to this sweet hymn composed by Rev. Henry Francis Lyte. It was the last hymn he ever wrote, and owes its origin to the fact that a short time before it was written, in 1847, many Sunday school teachers and other helpers in Mr. Lyte's parish suddenly left the church and went over to the Plymouth brethren. To these deserters it is said he alludes in the first verse, where he writes, "When other helpers fail." Owing to the state of his health, broken by devotion to his flock, the good vicar was obliged to seek the restoring influence of a warmer clime. During the evening previous to his departure for Nice he strolled, as was his custom, by the seashore alone. On his return he retired to his study, and an hour later presented his family with Abide With Me, accompanied by music which he had also composed. He died a few months later at Nice, where he now lies buried.

The delicate egret feathers which adorn so many bonnets and hats nowadays are obtained at the expense of cruel suffering. The birds have to be shot when watching over their newly-hatched young, leaving the nestlings to die of starvation. If this fact were generally known would it make any difference with women? A Chicago wholesale dealer in feathers thinks not, as he is reported to have said: "If a few ladies of Paris were to begin to wear live birds in their hats this year there would be a big trade in live birds for that purpose here next year, no matter what your Humane Society might say."

Take away love and our earth is a tomb.—Browning.

Closet and Altar

Blessed be God, who has made earth and heaven one in the heart's unquenchable thirst for him!

The Lord's Supper is to us what it was to the twelve disciples who first partook of it—the supreme occasion of self-manifestation. The object for which this simple ceremony was instituted was to bring the living Christ before the thought of his people. The command of the Master, "This do in remembrance of me," means "Observe this ordinance as a memorial of me after my death, by it remember me not as dead but as present with you." The Lord's Supper is not a festival of death but of life; it is not designed to commemorate a dead Saviour but to be the means by which we are to commune with a living Saviour.—James M. Campbell.

No one has lived the inner life without seasons of early passions when the romance of Jesus has captured the soul, without seasons of later declension when the greenery of spring grew gray in the city dust. It is in such hours of coldness and weariness we ought to re-enforce our souls with the sacrament of the bread and wine.—Ian Maclaren.

Be known to us in breaking bread,
But do not then depart;
Saviour, abide with us and spread
Thy table in our heart.

Lord, sup with us in love divine;
Thy body and thy blood—
That loving bread, that heavenly wine—
Be our immortal food.

Without God heaven would be no heaven. With him heaven is not first a locality, but wherever one is in his presence there is the heavenly life. Not heaven in its fullness, but the first elements of the heavenly life. In entering, then, into his presence here and now, amid our daily common interests, we have entered into a spiritual kingdom where, so far as we live in sympathy with it, there is perfect spiritual harmony; where there is no law of compulsion, but the perfect service is the perfect freedom; where the will of the one great loving Spirit is evidently so reasonable, so just and so true that any one who is in sympathy with the heavenly life acts in harmony with it as if it were his own will. —Bishop Lawrence.

Blessed be thou, O righteous Father, for the mission of our Redeemer; and blessed be he who came to do thy will, who humbled himself that we might be exalted, who became poor that we through his poverty might be rich. Grant us, we pray, the indwelling of his spirit, that we may be more than conquerors through him who loved us, and gave himself for us. May we know how the kingdom of heaven comes into the heart, when the affections are set on things above. Make us entirely thine, we beseech thee; go with us as we go from this hour of communion with thee; and grant that in all our thoughts and ways, in life and in death, and in the life beyond, we may acknowledge thee as Lord, to the glory of thy holy name, world without end, through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

Mothers in Council.

A KINDERGARTEN FOR MOTHERS.

A question which I am sure has puzzled many mothers was asked by

A Teacher: "Can a child be too generous, too self-sacrificing?"

The Mother Helper: "Yes, I think so. Generosity may interfere with loyalty, for instance, when a child willingly gives away gifts received from friends. Too much self-sacrifice in one member of a family may make the other members selfish."

A Successful Teacher: "How can one in the home and at school secure instant obedience? Many children are obedient in a dilatory, half-hearted way."

The Mother Helper: "'Obedience with a question mark' should never be accepted. I should practice sense games frequently—those that require instant response to a question or command. Invent them yourself, beside using the ordinary gymnastics. For instance, strike a chord on the piano and have the child tell immediately whether it is loud or soft; point to colors and ask for an instant response. Then ask that when you speak obedience may be as prompt. Where possible, suggest that for a certain length of time—a half-hour or so—obedience shall be immediate and give many opportunities during that time for practice. For little children make a game of obeying like a dog on all fours."

A Mother: "What can be done with an imaginative child who seems hardly to know whether he is telling the truth or not?"

The Mother Helper: "When he tells you something you know to be untrue say: 'Why, that is a play story, isn't it? What made you think of it?' When you are not sure whether he is telling you a true story or one that is true only in his mind ask him which it is. Do not make much of it unless you know it to be a deliberate untruth. Give him practice in accurate description. Another time ask him to tell you just true stories for a certain length of time. Another way is to accept the statement of the child and have natural consequences follow; for instance, a little boy of my acquaintance said to his father at breakfast on several successive mornings, 'Papa, I haven't had any bath this morning.' The fourth morning after breakfast his mother said quietly that he must have his bath if he had not had it, took him upstairs and went through the whole operation. Of course that was the last of that little joke."

A Young Mother: "Should a child be allowed to destroy flowers?"

The Mother Helper: "No, I think not. A child should not be encouraged even to pick wild flowers which he does not intend to use, and for which he is not willing to care. Even a little child should be taught to put its posy in water to keep it fresh, and never be allowed to pull it carelessly to pieces. A baby will hold a flower in its hand until he loves it to death, but I should even then have him see you put it in water."

An Enthusiastic Mother: "My little boy can't remember which is m and which is n. When writing he will ask me to spell a word for him, for instance, sing, and when I say n he asks, 'Is that two loops or three loops, mamma.' The little schemes I have used to help him remember have not as yet been successful. Can you suggest something for such little kinks in the memory."

The Mother Helper: "Make a joke of it. Say every time you see him, 'Tom, m stands for monkey, two loops or three loops? Quick, my son.' And after you have kept this up for a time take something entirely different, as, 'M stands for music, two loops or three loops?' and I think the little trouble will be straightened out. I have known other such cases."

A Young Mother: "Should one be distressed over playful disobediences on the part of a child naturally obedient?"

The Mother Helper: "O, no. The child wishes to express his own little I to see what the you will do. He is interested in your actions as you are in a play. Don't make much of the trifling disobedience if you can see he is making progress in obedience; make a little game to distract his attention."

Another Young Mother: "Sometimes, as a consequence of wrongdoing, I leave my little boy alone in his room for a stated length of time. He seems to be but slightly affected by it and invents games for his amusement until the time is past. Sometimes he has even hilarious games, somersaults on the bed, and so on. Do you think there is any good result gained from such treatment of wrongdoing?"

The Mother Helper: "I believe most thoroughly in different degrees of isolation from the mother and the family as consequences of wrongdoing. In such a case as you state, where the child evidently possesses strong individuality and has many resources within himself, there may appear to be no immediate good result, but I think the child probably feels his isolation to a certain extent. It might do to blindfold the child gently, explaining why you do so, and then have him sit quietly in a chair for the stated time. When you remove the cover from the eyes draw the child to you and talk things over in a loving way. When a child persists in disobedience lessen your own resistance, and, instead of making an issue with him, take the child into your lap and cuddle him and sing, and the little heart will soften and no resistance will be necessary. Try always to bring yourself as near as possible to your child's view of things and let him see your sympathy."

MRS. H. W. BOYNTON.

A PARENTAL FAULT.

"I shall never forget," remarked a lady to me, "the feeling I used to entertain towards my father, who often took occasion to reprimand me for some girlish fault in the presence of visitors. The first time was when I was about thirteen and when we were entertaining my teacher, for whose esteem I was particularly desirous. He noticed that the lamp chimney was not clear, and as this was my care he rebuked me sharply. Similar fault-finding recurred again and again, in spite of much care to guard against it on my part, till I became afraid to appear in the parlor when guests were present. It seemed to me actual cruelty, and I sometimes thought I could never forgive my father for subjecting me to such embarrassment."

It is strange that any parent should be so thoughtless in this respect. It is sufficient discourtesy to introduce disagreeable domestic subjects outside the home circle, but when it irritates and antagonizes a sensitive son or daughter it is not only distressing to the visitor but most harmful to the child.

"I told her of it right before folks so as to shame her," was the admission of a woman who called herself a sensible, good mother. If her one object was "to shame," she succeeded in a way. Young people are naturally heedless and faulty, but oftener than is usually supposed are gifted with pride and sensitiveness. Such open, untimely rebukes strike them as unjust and unkind, and the incentive to more thought and care is lost in indignant resentment—a feeling which should quickly call forth a parent's respect and apology, for it denotes a trait of character that is itself commendable and deserves careful training; but, alas! it is often miscalled rebellion and punished as such.

It is these little things that drive children from the confidence of parents, for how can they respect parental authority when it shows itself so erring, and gives so little consideration to the value of childish feeling? Is it true that parents do not vividly recall their own childhood till they are grandparents?

M. S. H.

Almost every invention of civilization is destructive to the creatures of earth, water and air. The steam plow, the steam reaper, the steam engine drive before them millions of once happy, woodland born creatures, among whom the birds are the most numerous sufferers. It may not be generally known that among the destructive agencies are the great electric lights of the lighthouses, which are responsible for the death of thousands of sea and migratory song birds, that dash in headlong flight against the revolving glare and fall dead from the shock.

The Conversation Corner.

WE will take up now the rest of those "S to Z" letters from new members, which were put back in the Drawer last week, and finish them—even if I have to leave out some belonging to U!

NORTH TROY, VT.

Dear Mr. Martin: My little brother Clive and I wish to be Cornerers. Will you take us? I am nine years old and have just been sick, but am better. We want a Corner Scrap-book and Pomiuk's picture and some Newfoundland stamps. Will send in this money for the Scrap-book and Pomiuk. CLEON S.

Dear Mr. Martin: Can I join the Cornerers? I will be five years old in April and then I can go to school all the time and I have a leather bag that my mother and I got in Montreal. I send —— cents for Pomiuk. I earned it doing chores for mamma and selling egg shells to Aunt Elnora for her hens.

CLIVE S.

Why don't Aunt Elnora's hens eat their own egg shells? O, I forgot—probably their eggs are sold and the purchasers do not take the trouble to return the shells!

Dear Mr. Martin: We are pleased with the new Corner Scrap-book. We like the color of the cover better and it paid us for waiting. We have been to a "sugaring off" in the maple woods today and over sixty were there and the sugar was spread in places on the snow banks among the trees and, with the morning sun and the blue sky and the brown trees and white snow, it was a pretty sight, worth going a mile to enjoy, especially the fine warm sugar. We like the picture of your library and your home—tell us where it is, please. Good-by. CLEON AND CLIVE S.

Certainly—it is at Cornerville, near Boston. See directions for finding it on the certificate of membership in the Scrap-book. As to the latter, I must explain that the first edition having been exhausted I had another lot made. They are exactly the same, only a little different; the sides being black instead of blue—less likely to be soiled. They cost a few cents more than the other edition, but as the object of the publication is not to make a fortune, but to get our members into the habit of careful, systematic preservation of valuable cuttings for future use in a paged and indexed volume, the price remains the same, viz., $1.25, adding 25 cents to carry it anywhere in the United States. In ordering it, please give your full name if you wish it placed on the certificate of membership, which forms one of the pictorial introductory pages.

I used to go just a mile to "grandpa's," in my boyhood, to "see grandma and sugar too" in the springtime, and I would go five miles now to assist at "waxing" the syrup on the snow!

GILDERSLEEVE, CT.

Dear Mr. Martin: I have always wanted to join the Corner but I have never got to it before. I am ten years old. I have three little sisters and two brothers. Once I had two pretty little kittens, but they died, and now I have no pets but my three little sisters, and they are the nicest kind of pets, I think, don't you? RUTH S.

Yes, Ruth; I would certainly rather have three little sisters than two little kittens.

DORCHESTER, MASS.

Dear Pomiuk: I go to the Pilgrim Church and I intend to be a member when I get old enough. I am eleven years old and I am in the grammar. This is marble time but I am not a good player. They most always win them, and one day I lost twenty-seven. I would like to know if you play and if the fellows skin many. I have a little brother five years old who is awful funny. One day he was drinking some milk and my sister asked him how it tasted. He said it tasted elegant. She said hers tasted better because it tasted grandissime. When he had some more she asked him how it tasted and he said, "It tastes as good as yours did last time!"

Your true friend, JOHN S.

I don't think Pomiuk would have understood all that even if it had been written in Eskimo! He was very good at the World's Fair, as some may remember, at whipping the nickels out of the ground with a long sealskin whip. Never mind, John, if you don't win at marbles—it is far better to be at the head of your classes "in the grammar"! (But is it right to play for "keeps" ?)

READING, MASS.

Dear Mr. Martin: I would like to be a little Cornerer with the other children. I am seven years old and I began to go to school last year. I have a book about Indians, their habits, battles and homes. I like to make calendars. Your loving little friend, RAY T.

HANNIBAL, MO.

Dear Mr. Martin: I am eight years old. I would like to be a Cornerer. I go to school. I have two little sisters, one is called Tina and the other Margaret. I got a writing desk for my birthday present. Good by. JEANIE T.

SOUTH DENNIS, MASS.

Dear Mr. Martin: I am almost nine. I have a cat whom I was going to name Kitty Clover before I read the Conversation Corner at all! I do not exactly know who Sarah Noah is; please tell me. I so enjoy the Corner that I wish to be a member. May I?

MARGARET U.

Margaret U., you may! Sarah Noah is the little girl who named our Kitty Clover, although she is not quite as little now as when the name was given.

LAWRENCE MASS.

Dear Mr. Martin: When I saw that big envelope I wondered what could be in it. When I opened it and found that certificate I was very much pleased and I thank you very much for it. My brother Ray and I have the whooping cough. He sometimes says that he rolls a hoop in the night. I have a little lock-up, as I call it, to keep my treasures in. I should like to come and see you very much and probably I shall some time when I am in Boston. BURTON V.

NEWTON CENTRE, MASS.

Dear Mr. Martin: I am Emory's sister, nine years old. I like the Corner very much and am very interested in Pomiuk. I inclose some money for the "Corner Cot." I earned it all myself.

I am your new Cornerer, CATHERINE W.

HARTFORD, CT.

Dear Mr. Martin: I am not a Cornerer, but would like to be one. We have seven little chickens. I am ten years old, and would like to know how old you are. ALDEN W.

See answer to same question last week.

HATFIELD, MASS.

Dear Mr. Martin: I am twelve years old, and I would like to belong to the Corner. I have a very pretty little Maltese kitten, her name is Blossom Grey and I think she would have taken the prize at the cat show if I had taken her. Mamma has a red shawl and Blossom thinks it belongs to her and lies on it wherever it is. Last year papa gave me a Crescent bicycle. I have one bantam rooster and I would like to take care of Reuben's hens, but he won't let me. LOUISA W.

How kind in R., for taking care of hens is hard work! Curiously enough, I saw yesterday a little girl who has your name riding on a "Crescent," which she had just learned to use. Very likely your Blossom Grey would have taken the prize—as Kitty Clover was not there! Today at a place where I called a girl introduced me to her cat, Towser (Towser Black, I think), and told me that every afternoon at a regular time he goes to a neighbor's house, where there are two cats, takes supper, and then returns. Even if he isn't hungry, he goes over and sees the others eat. I had a call from a Hatfield boy the other day. [I have omitted one letter, from Albert W., Olivet, Mich.; is that Wright?—D. F.]

CORNER SCRAP-BOOK.

Dogs as Policemen. We know about watch-dogs, but did we know that they could be trained to serve as police watchmen? A San Francisco paper has an account of a dog in that city, who first went with his master as companion in taking his rounds in the night, and then began to imitate him in his routine duties. Jack soon learned every house on the route and would run ahead and "try" the doors by jumping against them. After a little, he would put his ear to the keyhole to listen for any sound inside. Now he is so well trained that he makes several rounds by himself every night. He never misses a door, nor fails to listen carefully to know that all is right. Jack has already been the means of capturing several sneak thieves. For the latter were not alarmed at the presence of a dog, and went on in their thieving work until the police suddenly appeared and caught them. Why cannot dogs in Atlantic cities become police assistants? By civil service examination they might learn where the different streets are and how the street cars run, things which somehow regular policemen do not usually seem to know!

Why Do Dogs Bark? Our first answer will naturally be, in the words of the poet,

For 'tis their nature to.

But here comes a naturalist (Frederick Boyle) and says that it is not "their nature to"! He says that no wild breeds make any noise except howling and snarling, nor under the best circumstances will they learn to bark until the third or fourth generation. He says that the coyote (which, though called the prairie wolf, is nearly allied to the dog) never barks, and that an old Central American native assured him that dogs learned to bark in imitation of their master, as he shouted to drive his cattle to the corral. Will not the inquisitive, intelligent young folks, for whom these Scrap-book notes are chiefly intended, bring up this matter in their natural history classes, or look it up for a "composhion," as Lawrence R. called it in last week's Corner? How about the coyote? Webster says that "its voice is a snappy howl, followed by a prolonged, shrill bark." Will our Latin scholars tell us the meaning of its scientific name, "Canis latrans"? Perhaps Dr. Grenfell or our Newfoundland stamp friend (or Pomiuk!) will inform us whether the wild wolf dogs of Labrador do or do not bark.

Thirteen Months in a Year. How would Ray T., of this week's Corner, like to make a new calendar, with thirteen instead of twelve months for the year? That is what a newspaper writer in the New York Herald proposes, having twelve months of twenty-eight days—four even weeks—and an added month of twenty-nine days, making the 365 days of the year. For leap years, the thirteenth month would have thirty days. The special advantage claimed for this reckoning is that the same day of the week would be connected with the same day of the month through the year. That is, if the New Year were to begin on Monday, every Monday would be the 1st, 8th, 15th and 22d, all through the year; Tuesdays the 2d, 9th, 16th, 23d, etc. The changes of the moon, it is said, would come on about the same dates throughout the year, and calculations of interest and for maturing notes would be greatly simplified. But should we not be obliged to have new dates for our birthdays, so as to agree with the new reckoning? The writer suggests Lunar as the name of the new month. Probably many would suggest Lunatic as an appropriate name for him! But no doubt some such name was applied to Gregory XIII. in 1582 when he made the new calendar which bears his name.

John Bunyan

By Clifton Johnson

BUNYAN'S CHAIR

JOHN BUNYAN was born in the little village of Elstow on the outskirts of Bedford in 1628. His father was a maker and mender of pots and kettles and this trade the son inherited. As a boy he was sent to school, but the education received was slight and he early went to work with his father. In later life Bunyan spoke of himself as a "tinker." But neither he nor his father were of the vagrant, gypsy tribe. They had a settled home in Elstow, where were their forge and workshop, and their wanderings were confined to occasional journeys about the neighboring region in search of jobs.

When sixteen years old Bunyan's mother died and within two months his father married again. This seems to have jarred the household harmony and Bunyan in his irritation enlisted as a soldier. One episode of his army life to which he frequently refers in his writings is of special interest. He says: "When I was a soldier I, with others, was drawn out to go to such a place to besiege it. But when I was just ready to go one of the company desired to go in my room, to which when I consented he took my place, and coming to the siege, as he stood sentinel, he was shot in the head with a musket ball and died."

BUNYAN'S COTTAGE

After an army life of two years Bunyan returned to his trade, and presently, at about twenty years of age, he married. He was very poor at that time and he says that they started their married life "without so much as a dish or a spoon between them." But, what was of more importance, his wife brought with her from her home two pious books of her father's, the reading of which produced a marked effect on Bunyan. Up to this time he had been inclined to lawlessness. He was full of spirit and daring and delighted in dancing, bell-ringing and in all kinds of rural sports. He was the leader of the village youth in merrymakings and in the Sunday revels on the green. As to his language, he had the reputation of being the "ungodliest fellow for swearing" the villagers had ever heard. Now he dropped swearing and began to give up his favorite pastimes. However, the reformation was gradual and he continued unconverted and a Sabbath breaker. He tells us that one Sunday afternoon on the green, while in the midst of a game of tipcat, "having struck the cat one blow from the hole, just as I was about to strike it a second time, a voice did suddenly dart from heaven into my soul, which said, 'Will thou leave thy sins and go to heaven, or have thy sins and go to hell.' At this I was put to an exceeding maze; wherefore, leaving my cat upon the ground, I looked up to heaven, and was as if I had, with the eyes of my under standing, seen the Lord Jesus looking down upon me, and as if he did severely threaten me with some grievous punishment." This vision threw him into a fit of despair, in which he resolved, as he must be lost, to at least enjoy the present, and for a time he resumed the lawless habits of his boyhood. But this did not last and a little later he became a diligent attendant at church services and a close student of the Bible—that is, of its narrative portions, for he says that "Paul's epistles and such like Scriptures I could not away with." It was at this time that Bunyan fancied he would be happy and sure of salvation if he could trace his descent from the Jews. His father's assurances that there was no trace of Hebrew blood in the family disappointed and depressed him.

"BUNYAN MEETING," BEDFORD

For three or four years he continued in a spiritual conflict, full of sudden alternations of hope and fear that ended in his joining the Nonconformists. Bunyan had a gift for exhortation and in 1657 he was regularly ordained as a preacher. He continued at his trade and preached wherever his work called him, in Bedford and surrounding villages. His auditorium was sometimes the woods, sometimes a barn, sometimes a village green, sometimes a town chapel. But he was a man of power, his fame spread and the people flocked in crowds to hear the blaspheming tinker turned preacher. His popularity aroused the antipathy of the settled ministry and by them he was called a witch, a Jesuit, a highwayman. But these attacks had no effect on Bunyan. He perhaps feared slanders less than he did flattery, for it is said that when one of his hearers told him that he had given them a "sweet sermon," he answered, "The devil told me that before I was out of the pulpit." The first literary effort of Bunyan's of which we know was a pamphlet published in 1656, protesting against teachings of the Quakers. This provoked some sharp rejoinders, and Bunyan defended himself with a second and third work on the same subject. The latter took the parable of the rich man and Lazarus for its text and was impressively entitled Sighs from Hell, or the Groans of a Damned Soul.

He was always an opponent of the Quakers, and he rejoiced to bring them to confusion with his ready wit. While he was in prison one of the sect came to him and said, "Friend Bunyan, the Lord has sent me to seek for thee; I have been through several countries in search for thee, and now I have found thee."

"Friend," was Bunyan's response, "thou dost not speak truth in saying the Lord sent thee to seek me, for the Lord well knows that I have been in this jail for some years, and if he had sent thee he would have sent thee here directly."

On the restoration of the Stuarts to the throne of England old acts against the Nonconformists were revived, their meeting houses were closed, all persons were commanded to attend their parish churches, and it became illegal for any one to preach who was not in Episcopal orders. Bunyan paid no attention to these restrictions. Wherever he found the brethren—in barns, private houses, under trees—he preached the word to them. He was so daring an offender that within six months he was arrested. The authorities were favorably disposed toward him, but he obstinately refused to mend his course, and there was nothing to do but to commit him to the county jail. There he remained almost continuously for the next twelve years—such a hopeless length of time that he declared he thought he should lie there "till the moss should overgrow his eyebrows." His prison life was not altogether unhappy. By some of his jailers he was allowed a great deal of liberty, and in the early years of his imprisonment he went outside frequently.

Bunyan's wife died in 1655, leaving for his care four small children. He married again in the early years of his prison life, and the second wife proved a good mother to his little family and showed great courage and tenacity in the efforts she made to procure his release. She even made a fruitless journey to London to appeal to the House of Peers. But Bunyan continued in prison till the penal statutes against the Nonconformists were repealed in 1672. He at once took out a license to preach and within a few months was called to the pastorate of the Bedford congregation. His church was a barn in the orchard of one of his dissenting hearers. Bedford was the center of Bunyan's work, but his ministrations extended through the whole county. He made stated circuits and won the title of "Bishop" Bunyan. His activity was ceaseless and his popularity constantly increased.

Bunyan never lacked for hearers when he preached. Even in London on a week day morning he would draw crowds, and when he preached on Sunday the meeting houses would not contain the people. His power of reaching the heart was remarkable.

The acts against the Nonconformists were revived after a few years and Bunyan sometimes had to travel in disguise. In 1675 he was again imprisoned. The indictment describes the offense as "devilishly and perniciously abstaining from coming to church to hear divine service, and for being a common upholder of several unlawful meetings and conventicles, to the great disturbance and distraction of the good subjects of the kingdom."

The legend is that Bunyan was this time confined in the town jail on old Bedford bridge. It was probably in this six months' imprisonment that in one of his dreams the idea of The Pilgrim's Progress came to him. The first edition of this masterpiece was published in 1678.

Two years later Bunyan died. His death was the result of a cold caught on a ride through the rain from London to Reading, whither he went to reconcile a father and son who had quarreled. The estate he left was under £100. Of his six children the only known representatives are the descendants of his youngest daughter, who married William Browne. But this particular clan is numerous and widespread.

Bunyan personally was tall, strong boned, ruddy faced, with keen eyes and reddish hair that in later life was sprinkled with white. He was plain and modest in his demeanor, a stout friend and a stout foe and a master of straightforward, incisive English. The writings published in his lifetime make a long list, but it is The Pilgrim's Progress, of course, which outranks all others, and perhaps no work ever published has had a wider circulation than this if we except the Bible.

Bedford has many American visitors attracted solely by Bunyan's connection with the city. A plain brick Congregational church known as the "Bunyan Meeting" occupies the site of the building in which he preached, and the vestry contains a chair which belonged to him and a door from Bedford Gaol.

A mile outside the clean old town is Bunyan's home village of Elstow—a quaint little place where thatched roofs and overhanging upper stories are the rule rather than the exception. It has such an ancient look that I fancy that were Bunyan to come back today he would not find the village very different from that he was familiar with more than 200 years ago. The little box of a cottage where he lived after his marriage is there still, with its white-washed yellow walls snug to the road. It has a sign on it "Bunyan's Cottage," and you can go in if you choose, though if you are very tall or wear a "chimney pot" hat you must have a care or you or your head-wear will get damaged. The kitchen is so tiny and so filled with its furniture and Bunyan mementos for sale that it gets crowded if more than one visitor attempts to look about in it at a time.

I visited the church, and a girl who was there sweeping let me look into the church tower, which stands separate from the main building among the graves of the churchyard. Bunyan used to ring the bells, and, lest they should come tumbling down through the hollow open of the tower on him, he stood under the stone arch of the doorway. This made the rope saw on the edge of the arch above, and the girl pointed out two grooves that his rope had worn.

In front of the churchyard is the village green where Bunyan used to play tipcat of a Sunday. On one of the hillocks of the green was the stump of an old sun dial. Long ago I suppose the poorer people of the village who had no clocks used to resort to this dial when they felt anxious to know the exact time. Some say that Bunyan preached in the old moat hall that stands on the green, and "the tree under which Bunyan preached" is also pointed out, but the authenticity of these things is doubtful and one takes most satisfaction in the village itself, which smacks delightfully of mellow age and of days that are centuries past.

PROGRESS OF THE KINGDOM.

TWELVE MONTHS OF SUNDAY SCHOOL MISSIONARY WORK.

In these days, when perplexing financial embarrassment is the rule in missionary organizations, perhaps only those officially concerned in their administration fully understand what careful planning and business sagacity are implied in the fact that the C. S. S. and P. S. has reached the end of its sixty-fourth year without a debt—indeed, with a balance of more than $1,400 in the treasury. But let not the churches congratulate themselves that this commendable state of affairs has been the result of their generosity, nor that this society is so prosperous that special efforts in its behalf are unnecessary. Already the Sunday school missionary work has suffered by the urgent calls for help from the larger societies burdened with debt and steadily the contributions to their smaller sister organization have decreased. In 1891 and 1892 the churches gave over $56,000 each year to this cause, in 1893 the sum was reduced to $54,500, in 1894 to $52,250 and in 1895 it has shrunk to $49,000. Less than 1,000 churches are on the list of contributors, while 3,000 Sunday schools have sent offerings. The legacies during the past year amounted to only $3,544 as against $22,340 in the preceding twelve months. This reduction, together with the diminished contributions from the churches, caused a decrease in the annual income of over $22,000, which would have entailed a debt but for the use of certain available funds received as legacies during a previous year, the appropriation of $5,000 from the business department and the balance of nearly $4,000 on hand at the beginning of this financial year. The receipts from all sources in the missionary department have been $69,835.

The record of work accomplished during twelve months presents nothing but encouragement. Thirty-four superintendents and missionaries have labored in various fields in the East, West and South, in the prosecution of their work traveling 425,000 miles and making 6,500 addresses. By the society's aid 566 Sunday schools have been organized during the year, nearly 100 more than during the previous twelve months, and many others have been reorganized. California, in its two districts, leads the list with respect to the largest number of new schools, having eighty-seven, Oregon follows with seventy-four, Washington reports forty-two and Minnesota thirty-one. Lesson helps and papers to the number of 3,501 have been given to 1,550 different schools.

The total number of mission Sunday schools at present is about 1,268, of which 1,064 are in places where there is no other Christian work of any kind, and 928 are not on the line of railroads or other main thoroughfares of travel. "How much this means of present good and future promise in these hitherto neglected fields," says the secretary in his annual report, "no one can understand who does not know the barrenness of the unwatered desert and the fruitfulness and beauty of the same broad acres when streams of living water have irrigated the dry and dusty soil." Of the other 204 schools about 100 are in large cities, several of them among the foreign-born population. There is growing opportunity for efforts among this latter class, and during the past year a German and a Swedish missionary have been in the field and a man familiar with the Danish and Norwegian tongues and ways is urgently demanded. The society's superintendent in Southern California has so far familiarized himself with the language of the Mexican population as to obtain access to their hearts and homes. In addition to this work the society continues to help German, Norwegian, Swedish, French and Italian papers.

The business department reports a fairly prosperous year considering the financial depression. Subscriptions to the periodicals have so increased that the lists show the largest circulation ever reached. Nevertheless the outlook of the society as a whole is not, in view of the shrinkage of income, as hopeful as last year. Already it has been necessary to retrench and to say "No" to urgent and imperative appeals. The question is will the churches refuse to listen to the needs of a missionary society so long as it keeps out of debt?

The Late Rev. Horace Waller. The natives of the Dark Continent have lost a bold advocate and a devoted friend by the death of Horace Waller, whose sagacious counsels on African affairs were never darkened by the shadow of self-interest. From his earliest days and onward he maintained a passionate regard for the regeneration of Africa and its people. As a youth Mr. Waller was an engineer and for some time a member of Livingstone's famous Zambezi expedition. In 1860 he joined the Universities' Mission to Central Africa and was associated with the first bishop, the heroic Bishop Mackenzie. The latter part of his life Mr. Waller spent as rector of an English country parish, but his voice and pen were always at the service of the Dark Continent. It was he who reverently and affectionately edited Livingstone's Last Journals, which were published in 1874. About five years ago Mr. Waller published a small book entitled Ivory, Apes and Peacocks: An African Contemplation. But it was chiefly through the columns of the press, notably the London Times, that his energy was expended in behalf of the African. It was his constant endeavor to look at every question from the native's point of view and to induce others to do the same. No more determined opponent of slavery and the slave trade existed, and he was never tired of denouncing the sin and shame, as he deemed it, of the existence of legalized servitude in Zanzibar and East Africa under the British flag.

Do Missions Pay? A proposal, which originated with some professors of Chicago University, to send out a World's Commission to investigate the success or failure of foreign missionary work suggested a symposium in The Review of the Churches, including articles by Mr. Arnold White, Dr. R. N. Cust on one side and Mr. Eugene Stock of the Church Missionary Society and Rev. R. Wardlaw Thompson of the London Missionary Society on the other. Mr. White's paper purports to be "an impartial inquiry into the financial management and results of a century of Protestant missions," but we have no patience with a man who intimates that foreign missions and their supporters are responsible for "not preventing the girdle of drink and foul disease our race has fastened around the earth" and whose whole treatment of his subject is antagonistic. He draws comparisons between the respective cost of Protestant and Catholic missions, decidedly unfavorable to the former, and concludes with the statement that missionary theology is an insurmountable obstacle to the subtler intelligence of Asia. Mr. Cust declares in a vague way that there must be a change in men and methods and refers with sarcasm to exaggerated mission reports, which he characterizes as "benevolent myths." Mr. Stock answers the criticisms and points out the inconsistencies in the first two articles in a sensible and convincing manner and we wish his article and Mr. Thompson's might have a wide reading. On the whole the discussion seems to be disappointingly inconsequential. As The British Weekly says, in an editorial comment, the practical question is whether missionaries are not too well paid. Their critics say that the lot of a missionary is, generally speaking, better from a worldly point of view than that of a man of the same abilities who remains in the home field, but Mr. Thompson asserts that this is a reflection on the home churches, rather than on the foreign missionary societies.

Effort to Revive Confucianism. It is amusing to see the conservative Chinese adopting our methods in an anti-Christian movement of which the chief significance is its indication of the power which Christianity is exerting. A Shanghai newspaper has published a translation of an interesting document signed by hundreds of Chinese scholars, which calls for railways, post offices, public libraries, the opening of mines and all sorts of useful reforms, and lays special stress on the need of a revival of Confucianism. It advocates a religious department of education and demands that schools and temples be established at home and abroad. "The customs of our country are degenerating fast, because we have no religious teachers," to quote the words of this document; "thus it is that the depraved religions of foreign barbarians spring up and deceive our people. Every province is full of chapels whilst we have only one temple in each county for our sage, Confucius." Moreover these enterprising scholars propose sending Confucian missionaries to the barbarians at the emperor's expense, and indulge in this amusing bit of reasoning: "Thus we shall take Confucianism and with it civilize all the barbarians, and, under the cloak of preaching Confucianism, travel abroad and quickly learn the motives of the barbarians and extend the fame of our country."

SSON FOR MAY 10. Luke 18: 9–17.

LESSONS ON PRAYER.

BY REV. A. E. DUNNING, D.D.

Whoever considers the subject of prayer ets many difficulties. Over against them may place these facts:

1. Jesus prayed. In the crises of his life he rned trustfully to God. At his baptism, at e appointment of his apostles, on the night his transfiguration, in the Garden of Gethnane, on the cross, he appealed to God for s support and help. He prayed habitually, metimes all night long, sometimes rising fore the dawn, and at other times when on journeys. He prayed alone on mountain ps and on the highways in the presence of hers.

2. Jesus taught that men "ought always to ay." He said they should shut themselves o their closets and commune alone with od; that they should unite together in their titions; and that where two or three thus ned he would be with them. Men need t seek sacred places to find God. Whoever rships God in spirit and in truth is being ught by him, and will find God present erever and whenever he lifts his heart to n [John 4: 23, 24].

3. Jesus taught that God will answer prayer. is our Father, and as such is just as pleased give good things to his children as parents to grant their children's requests. The ly condition which belongs to these requests that they shall be offered in the name of rist, i. e., in the same spirit in which he ayed—"If ye abide in me, and my words ide in you, ask whatsoever ye will, and it all be done unto you." That spirit is subssive to the will of God. Its highest desire "Thy will be done, as in heaven, so on rth," Its confidence in his love and mercy constant. "And all things, whatsoever ye all ask in prayer, believing, ye shall reve." It looks on men as Christ looked on em; if need be, even as he looked on them m the cross when he prayed, "Father, forve them; for they know not what they do." Whatever the difficulties, then, one who beves on Christ and learns of him will pray, ll be conscious that God hears him and will ceive answers to his prayers. But Christ in ny ways, by example, precept, parable, ught his disciples how to pray. In this son he draws, as by a few strokes, a picre whose meaning cannot be mistaken and, ce seen, can never be forgotten.

In the temple stood a Pharisee, making his titions to God and giving the reasons why ey should be granted. He considered himf entitled to the special favor of God beuse he was so much better than other men. e was free from dishonesty and immorality. e was faithful in keeping holy days and he id honestly his share toward keeping up blic worship, therefore he expected that d would answer his prayers.

At a distance, perhaps in sight, in another om was a tax-gatherer, probably with a cord of dishonesty, for the temptation to s class was great and it was almost a necesy for them to be dishonest if they would osper. He offered no reason why God ould bless him except his need. He was a ner and he confessed it. He was ashamed it, sorry for it, as he showed by smiting his east and keeping his eyes downcast, but he d a very different idea of God from the arisee. He was dissatisfied with himself, nted to be like God and believed in the vine compassion. The Pharisee thought he s like God and therefore sure of the divine vor. He cast his eyes on the penitent puban and capped the climax of his conceit thanking God for the difference between em.

Having drawn the picture, Jesus empha-ed its meaning. The publican's prayer as answered. He wanted to be forgiven on the ground that he was sorry for his sins and renounced them, and he was forgiven. He went from the house of God to his own house a justified man. The Pharisee's prayer was not answered. He was satisfied with himself. He had nothing to ask for except to have his opinion of himself confirmed, but his opinion of himself was wrong, while the publican understood himself. It is always useless to offer prayer with false premises. Of such as he was Jesus said: "Ye are they that justify yourselves in the sight of men; but God knoweth your hearts; for that which is exalted in the sight of men is an abomination in the sight of God."

This lesson is applicable to all men, for they all belong to one of the two classes illustrated in this parable. Those who belong to one class are satisfied with themselves. So far as their characters are concerned they want nothing of God except his approval of what they are and this he cannot give and be true to himself. Those who belong to the other class are dissatisfied with themselves because they are conscious that they are sinners. They want help to become like God. This help he is always ready to give in answer to prayer. Yet there are answers given to both classes. No one prays without bringing about some change in his relation to God. "Every one that exalteth himself shall be humbled; and he that humbleth himself shall be exalted."

It may seem an abrupt transition to turn from the Pharisee and publican praying for themselves to Jesus praying for little children, but the theme continues the same. Mothers brought their infants to him, asking him to lay his hand on them and pray [Matt. 19: 13]. The spirit of the Pharisee sprang up in the minds of the disciples. As he looked down on the publican, so they looked down on the children. What had these infants done to deserve attention from God, while they, the disciples of Jesus, were getting ready for a new kingdom which he was to found and in which they expected to hold important positions? But their Master taught them again the lesson of the parable, and with a fine sense of its fitness Luke follows that parable with this incident. The helplessness and incompleteness of childhood appealed to God. He delights to give them what they need, for they have a growing consciousness of want of physical, mental and spiritual manhood. Those, whatever their age, who are possessed by such a sense of need, are fit subjects for the kingdom of God. There is no diviner service than to teach them how to go to him and ask for what they need.

Our Lord thus taught that prayer is far from being an expression of approval of God by those who pride themselves on having obeyed his commands. It is rather the utterance of a sense of want of being like him, of possessing his spirit; and no one who penitently and sincerely offers to him that petition will ever be denied.

THE CHURCH PRAYER MEETING.

Topic, May 3–9. Christ's Temptations and Ours. Luke 4: 1–13; Heb. 2: 14–18.

How was Christ tempted? How are we tempted as he was? How can he sympathize with us? How can he deliver us?

(See prayer meeting editorial.)

We must be earnestly attentive to heavenly signs; better keep awake in the street than fall to slumber in the church. Most people wander round the wall of existence seeking for crevices from which they may look out on God. They know all the while that from the poorest hut there are outlooks on the eternal, and that the smallest window-panes do not conceal from our eyes a single line, or a single star in the heavenly spaces. But it is not enough that we should possess a truth; the truth must take possession of us.—M. Materlinck.

SCHOOLS OF THE NOVEL.

As in every other art the critic follows in the wake of the creator and the artist turns aside at the public call to define his position and his theory of work, so in the copious modern art of the novelist we already have the critic and the self-revealing artisan or artist. We suppose that the result of the novelist's labor may claim more popularity than any other art product, and may safely presume, therefore, upon a widespread interest in the critical (and especially the self-critical) side of the matter.

First of all comes what we may call the caterer's theory of the art. "The novel is an intellectual artistic luxury," says Mr. Marion Crawford; and again, "Probably no one denies that the first object of the novel is to amuse and interest the reader." To cater to the idle and luxurious hours is the ideal which he sets before himself.

Next is what we may call the impressionist theory. "A novel is an impression," says Mr. Hardy, so taking only incidental account of his reader and concentrating attention upon his own interest in the embodiment of an idea of his own mind. If the impression happens to be a cynical or an immoral one, never mind! The public may read it or let it alone, but the author is under no moral obligations.

Allied to this is the old, dull, realistic school of which we all grew so weary, whose plan is to focus the camera upon some part of contemporary life and finish up the plate without retouching. Never mind if it shows you the same old humdrum life with which you are familiar. If a man reproduces what he sees, it is all you can ask of him. You can't expect him to introduce you to better company than he is accustomed to meet himself.

A fourth theory is that of the vivisectionist, whose interest in his victims is that of the psychological anatomist and who expects you to follow him to the dissecting room while with his scalpel he turns over "grey matter" and explains the processes of cerebration.

It is enough to answer all these practicing theorists in the definition of a critic of quite another school. "Art can be only life-communicating and life-enhancing," writes Mr. Berenson in his little book on the Florentine Painters of the Renaissance. "If it treats of pain and death, these must always appear as manifestations and as results only of living resolutely and energetically." Such a thought of art applied to the novel blows like a clear wind through the unwholesome air of the modern literary studios and hospitals. The artist owes something more to his public than an opiate or a whim, a photograph, or a study of pathology—he owes it to his readers to make them feel by his art that life is a larger thing than they have known, and that their own life grows larger in its contemplation.

BOOK REVIEWS.

ART.

The Florentine Painters of the Renaissance, with an index to their works by Bernhard Berenson. This is a notable book by a master of the topic of which it treats. Beginning with a subtle and suggestive analysis of enjoyment of painting, it takes up the Florentine painters from Giotto to Michael Angelo, pointing out their individual attainment and the place of each in a school which applied itself with a wonderful wealth of genius to the development of figure painting. How much is involved in the great step in advance which Giotto made, and how Masaccio, Leonardo, Botticelli and Michael Angelo—to take only the greater names—developed and varied that art, it is the purpose of this book to show. Whether we accept his explanation of the fundamental charm and purpose of art or no, these men occupy the central place in the art of painting, and Mr. Berenson's clearly reasoned account of their personality and labor cannot safely be overlooked by any student of the subject. For reference the index to the works of the principal Florentine painters appended to the essay is of great value. [G. P. Putnam's Sons. $1.00.]

An admirable hand-book for general reference is Architecture for General Readers, a Short Treatise on the Principles and Motives of Architectural Design. With a Historical Sketch, by H. Heathcote Statham, with illustrations drawn by the author. There has long been needed such a guide as this for those who have neither time nor inclination for close technical study, but who wish to be able to grasp the principles of architecture for information in travel or for building. On its own ground the book is competent, clear, and the unity of purpose in text and illustrations coming from the same hand is refreshing and valuable after the haphazard illustration of many books on the topic. We like the plan of putting the study of constructive architecture first, and are sure that the historical part will be much clearer for those who have gained an idea of the principles upon which the buildings of the two great schools, Greek and Gothic, were put together. There is a wise and fruitful insistence upon expression as the chief quality to be desired in a building, but the author only weakens his case and confuses his readers when he ventures off his own ground to say that "a painting of a figure or a landscape is primarily a direct imitation of the physical facts of nature," which is precisely what a good painting is not. [Charles Scribner's Sons. $2.00 net.]

BIBLICAL STUDY.

The International Critical Commentary: The Gospel According to Mark, by Prof. Ezra P. Gould. The International Critical Commentary goes bravely on. Driver and Sanday are now balanced by Moore and Gould, an English and an American work on each of the two Testaments. In point of scholarship, of accuracy, of originality, this last addition to the series is worthy of its predecessors, while for terseness and keenness of exegesis we should put it first of them all. One might well begin by studying, Bible in hand, the summary of the contents of the gospel as given in the Introduction, pp. xix–xxxii. The problem of the internal relation of the synoptics is constantly present to our author. He rejects the theory of a proto-Mark and regards oral tradition as the main source of the narrative portion of the book, while the close verbal resemblances to Matthew and Luke in the discourses indicate a common dependence on the Logia. Godet has made the contrary view familiar to American students. The wide use of Greek in the early diffusion of Christianity offsets, to some degree, Professor Gould's argument that the oral tradition must have been Aramaic and that thus it could not account for the minute resemblances in a foreign tongu We do not think the problem so nearly s tled as our author believes it to be. points of doctrine this book is sometim conservative, sometimes radical, but alwa independent and hence eminently wort of study. One of the chief merits of t book is its bold application of Biblic principles to present day questions; one its chief defects would disappear if t style, which is always clear, were as u formly pure; too often it falls below t dignity of the theme. [Charles Scribne Sons. $2.50.]

Readings from the Bible Selected Schools and to be Read in Unison, unc supervision of the Chicago Woman's Ed cational Union, Mrs. Elizabeth Blancha Cook, president; Mrs. Frederica Hoge Str burger, secretary; editorial committee, W. Onahan, J. H. Barrows, C. C. Bonney.

This somewhat unwieldy title-page prefixed to the selection from the Old a New Testaments which has been prepar for use in the Chicago public schools. E ternally the book has the appearance o modern school-book, being clearly print in not too black ink on soft-finished pap and bound in glazed linen with dull red l tering.

We have never been able to see why the should be any difficulty in the selection a agreement upon such a hand-book of t great Hebrew-English classic as this. T absence of this literature from school usa must of necessity be crippling both to t historical and literary sense of the chi throwing its mind out of the track of t race evolution, and on this ground alo public common sense was sure, sooner later, to force an agreement.

It is noticeable, as it was inevitable, th the selection has been principally ma from the poetic elements of the Bible. P haps the weakness of the book is the co parative minimizing of the history, a wea ness generally of our American intellectu training and all the more to be regrett because of our geographical isolatio There is, also, more patchwork than quite like, though the putting together brief related passages is very well don How far the selection is from being ma in the exclusive interests of Christiani and how purely popular and didactic a its ethical aims may be judged from t fact that a very large part of the wh book of Proverbs is here, and only t brief verses (relating to the publicity of o Lord's work) from the gospel of John. W realize the difficulties of the task which t committee had in charge, and are gratef that they have accomplished it so we The result is a "Woman's Bible" wor having, and we hope the influence of wom of all religious names may push this some other compend of the greatest litera monument of the English tongue back in its rightful place in popular educatio [Scott, Foresman & Co. Introduction pric 25 cents; mailing price, 30 cents.].

Sabbath and Sunday. The generation ministers now in middle life will recogni the larger part of this volume as a compe dium of the extended articles which th author, Rev. Dr. William De Loss Lov published some fifteen years ago in the Bi liotheca Sacra. The condensation is an im provement, but the chief value of the boo is in the practical part, which covers th last seven chapters, and treats of the a antages of the Sabbath to the physical, ental and moral life. It is true that most f this material can be found elsewhere, ut there is no danger that it will be too idely diffused or too deeply impressed on he mind. Such observations as those uoted from Emerson, Carlyle and Walter cott are always timely.

We do not agree with the author in at-aching great importance to the historical racing of Sabbath observance from the cre-tion of man through the entire Old Testa-ent, and from the days of Christ and the postles through the whole Christian era. f this be needful, so much the worse for his book, which presents a curious mix-ure of logical form with illogical dogma-ism. To tell the present generation of cholars, who read cuneiform inscriptions ating back to about 4000 B. C., that "Noah bserved septenary time near a thousand ears before Babylon appears," is only to eveal the great gulf between Dr. Love's osition and that of critical research. The ame variance comes out in many other tatements. One might wade through the atristic arguments of this book only to be-ome entangled in a maze of disagreeing udgments. We believe it is safer and bet-er to take the ground that the Sabbath is ere, however it came to us; to show that it roves itself a blessing wherever it is faith-ully observed; and to praise the wisdom of im who said the Sabbath was made for nan. [F. H. Revell Co. $1.25.]

TRAVEL.

When an Occidental with the sensitive im-gination and literary skill of Mr. Lafcadio Hearn gives himself up to the poetic side of Oriental life, the book in which he attempts o take us with him is sure to be a fascinat-ng one. In Kokoro, Hints and Echoes of Japanese Inner Life, we are brought very lose to a mode of thinking and philosophy f life which is as nearly as possible unin-elligible to us except as so interpreted. We are not in love with Buddhism as Mr. Hearn seems to be, nor do we think that he has estimated highly enough either the ympathy or the success of the missionaries whose work and knowledge he belittles, but he higher side of the older Japanese life nd faith is charmingly and sympatheti-ally set forth in these sketches and stories. There is much for us to learn in the study f Oriental ways and the contrast is not lways in favor of our own habits and civil-zation, as the chapter on the contrast be-ween the permanency of Occidental build-ng and the studied impermanence of Jap-nese life, and other passages of the book, learly show. [Houghton, Mifflin & Co. $1 25.]

In Greenland Ice Fields and Life in the North Atlantic Prof. G. Frederick Wright gives us the results of his voyage on the Miranda in 1894 and adds much informa-tion derived from other sources. The need of such a book was greatly felt by his fellow-travelers, for heretofore books on Greenland have been devoted to the story of one voyage and the places visited therein, and to gain an idea of the whole country it was necessary to read several volumes. But we have here a condensed and accurate description of the coasts of Labrador and Greenland, with chapters on the history, plants, animals and, most important of all, the author's observations on the inland ice and geological conditions. The excellent illustrations, which are almost all from photographs taken by members of the Miranda party or by Professor Chamberlin of the Peary relief expedition, are an important feature of the book. It deserves a high place both among books of travel and as a scientific work. [D. Appleton & Co. $2.00.]

General Greely's Handbook of Arctic Discoveries does for all the Arctic regions what Professor Wright's does for Greenland. It forms a complete compendium of Arctic exploration. The arrangement is topical, not chronological, so all the work done in one quarter is presented at once. It is condensed yet sufficient and thoroughly interesting. We feel safe in saying that it supplies a want and in commending it in every way. [Roberts Brothers. $1.00.]

Venezuela, by William E. Curtis, gives much interesting information about a country which has attracted considerable attention recently. The English literature about it is very limited and we welcome this readable book. It treats of all matters connected with the country and will be of considerable value to the tourist, settler or general reader. The historical sketch is quite complete, and the discussion of the boundary dispute and the publications of the documents relating thereto and the excellent map make it especially opportune. We are sorry to notice several careless misprints, especially in the occasional Spanish sentences and their translation. On page 87 the date 1708 should probably be 1807. This book, as well as that of Professor Wright's, is carefully indexed—an indispensable feature today. [Harper & Bros. $1.25.]

CHILDREN'S BOOKS.

A reproduction of the life of Jesus in a fresh form, by combining history with fiction in a manner to attract young people, is attempted by William E. Sloane in his book called The Wonderful. The reverent spirit in which it is written is worthy of highest praise, but in other respects it falls below the Story of Titus, which appeared about a year ago and essayed a similar portraiture of our Lord's life. [F. H. Revell. $1.25.]

Objective teaching is now recognized as one of the best ways in which to impart spiritual truths to little folks, and mothers, no less than Sunday school teachers, will welcome Rev. G. V. Reichel's book entitled What Shall I Tell the Children? An object illustrating some Scripture text and a simple story form the framework of each chapter. The book furnishes excellent material for Sunday afternoon talks in the home or for short sermons to the younger boys and girls. [Wilbur B. Ketcham. $1.50.]

Wee Dorothy's True Valentine, by Laura Updegraff, belongs to the Cosy Corner Series, which includes short original stories or reprints of classical juvenile literature. This is a tender little sketch of an orphaned brother and sister, who, after the mother's death, are adopted into different families, but are finally reunited after some rather exciting experiences. For sensitive children the story is almost too pathetic in spots, but otherwise it is charming. [Joseph Knight Co. 50 cents.]——From the same publishers and at the same price comes The Little Colonel, by Annie F. Johnston. The scene is laid in Kentucky and the title is the cognomen of a prankish but winsome maiden of five, who is the means of reconciliation between her aristocratic old grandfather and her mother, who, against his will, married a Northern man. The book is thoroughly sweet and wholesome and will delight older as well as younger readers.

In Paul French's Way Jennie M. Drinkwater tells a pleasant though somewhat commonplace story, which, in style and quality, reminds one of the Pansy books that are so popular with many young people. There is a slight tendency to preach in its pages, but not enough to be a serious blemish, and the book is a good one for Sunday school libraries. [A. I. Bradley & Co. $1.25 ]

Mary M. Mears, the author of Emma Lou, Her Book, shows good sense by half apologizing in the preface for publishing this diary of a girl of sixteen who lived her life "very crudely but very honestly." A book so full of false sentiment, vapid incidents and bad grammar can serve no useful purpose and has no excuse for being. [Henry Holt & Co. $1.00.]

MISCELLANEOUS.

Three books belonging to Macmillan's Miniature Series have been awaiting notice The series is issued in numbers in paper covers, beautifully printed on heavy paper. The Aims of Literary Study, by Prof. Hiram Corson of Cornell, is written by a teacher and has the needs and errors of current teaching much in view. It is wholesome in insisting on the dignity of letters, and condemning the treadmill processes by which they are often made irksome and hateful to the student. Literary education, he insists, is spiritual education. Both as to the substance and the method the book is full of suggestion and ought to be widely read.——Wholly different is F. Marion Crawford's The Novel: What It Is. To Mr. Crawford's confession of faith with respect to his practice of novel writing we are tempted to answer in Hamlet's words to Horatio, "I would not hear your enemy say so." We believe that novels—certainly some of Mr. Crawford's novels at least—are more than luxuries and pastimes, but at least the author of this essay lets himself down to the place of a caterer to idle people very entertainingly in this description of his own craft.——Numbers 11 and 12 contain Amiel's Journal, prefaced by a full and sympathetic introduction by Mrs. Humphry Ward. The lack of power to accomplish which struck Amiel's friends with dismay is reflected in this book and may be hurtful to some readers, but many others will be helped by its deep and acute thought and eager desire for wide knowledge. [Macmillan & Co. Paper, each 25 cents.]

Brother and Sister is a short life of Henriette Renan by her brother Ernest, and a selection from their correspondence from 1842 to 1845. Henriette was twelve years older than her brother and was always his guide and counselor. The period covered by the letters was the time of Renan's change from a student destined for the priesthood to a rationalistic scholar. Lady Mary Loyd has shown herself a careful and skillful translator. [Macmillan & Co. $2.00.]

For Plain Women Only, by George Fleming. This title is a plain bid for popularity, but we doubt whether readers who let their curiosity lead them to buy the book will consider that they have a first-rate pennyworth. There are gleams of rather British fun, which even grows sprightly at times, and not a little good sense, which everybody admits to be good, and which plain women and handsome alike are ready to follow—when it happens to be the fashion—but this modicum of good sense hardly deserved these two hundred pages of heavy paper and large print to recall them to the world, and the humor is, for the most part, very feeble. It would have been better, in our judgment, to have left the chapters to decent burial in the files of the Pall Mall Gazette whence they have been resurrected. [Merriam Co. $1.25.]

The bound volume of The Converted Catholic is of great interest and value as the organ of those who have left the Roman Catholic Church and are urging the claims of a pure gospel upon their brethren who remain. [New York: James A. O'Connor. $1.50.]

NOTES.

—— Of 2,967 students of Johns Hopkins University since its foundation but 748 have obtained degrees.

—— A friend of Princeton University, whose name is withheld, has offered to bear the expense of a new library building to cost between $300,000 and $500,000.

—— Miss Eliza E. Scidmore writes in the May Century of the Alaska boundary question, showing that the acceptance of the British claims would cut us off from the scenic region of the coast, including the great Muir glacier.

—— It is announced that all the money for the beacon in memory of Tennyson has been subscribed, and that it will be set up in its place on the Isle of Wight in the autumn. Of $4,750 subscribed, $1,250 came from the United States.

—— Among the discoveries of Prof. Flinders Petrie on the site of Thebes is that of a granite statue and tablet containing a very valuable reference to wars with the people of Israel. This inscription, when verified, is likely to prove a noteworthy piece of external evidence and check date for Old Testament history.

—— A design for a Stevenson memorial drinking fountain has been accepted in San Francisco from Willis Polk, a local architect, and Bruce Porter, an artist. It consists of a bronze ship upon a pedestal of California marble, with the inscription from Stevenson's Christmas Sermon, beginning, "To be honest, to be kind, to earn a little, to spend a little less."

—— Cornell has just secured a valuable collection of books on South America, gathered by Herbert Huntington Smith, a former student of the university and well known for his scientific studies and collections in Brazil and elsewhere. It includes seven hundred books and eight hundred pamphlets, many of which are not elsewhere accessible in the United States.

—— A library of the world's best literature in from twenty-five to thirty volumes is planned by J. A. Hill & Co. of New York under the editing of Charles Dudley Warner, assisted by Prof. Harry Thurston Peck and Hamilton W. Mabie. When it is all out we shall be interested to see what these highly competent gentlemen believe to be the world's best literature, but few of us, we imagine, will be ready to take their selection in exchange for our own libraries.

—— The first volume of the official compilation of the messages and state papers of the presidents of the United States from 1789 to 1897 is almost ready for delivery from the public printer in Washington. It will include the papers of the period from Washington to Madison. The subsequent volumes will carry the work down to the close of the present administration. The country is much indebted to Representative Richardson of Tennessee, for whom the compilation and editing of this work has been a labor of love.

—— Mr. Paderewski takes leave of America after a very successful tour, with the very graceful gift of $10,000 to be held by Mr. William Steinway, Col. H. L. Higginson and Dr. William Mason as trustees for the establishment of triennial prizes for composers of American birth. The manner of it is as graceful as the gift. "I only hope that it will prove to be useful and that your younger composers will not consider it as a gift, but as a debt," he writes, "this little encouragement coming from one who found in their land all the happiness to which an artist can aspire."

PRAYER MEETING.

BY REV. ISAAC O. RANKIN.

Topic, May 10–16. Serving Christ in Our Homes. Rom. 12: 9–18.

Diligence, sympathy and self-denial are the means by which love is to show itself in our home life. Successful homes are not as common as they ought to be, but no home can be a failure in which the members of the family are diligent, sympathetic and self-denying for love's sake.

Our own family circle is one of the best places to show our love for Christ, because it is a place where there are great temptations to forget him. When we go to church it is a little as soldiers go to dress parade—heads up, uniform brushed and eyes straight forward. When we go to school or business there are rules to limit us and work or study to keep our minds occupied. But when we go home we are very apt to think that we can do as we please, and that is just the time of all others when we need to take care to do only as Christ pleases. Perhaps you have known men who put off politeness when they put on slippers, and began to scold when they slammed their own garden gate behind them. For them home comfort was a temptation to forgetfulness of love.

Bearing witness at home is bearing the best kind of witness, because there is nothing so attractive as a loving, Christlike home to homeless people or to people whose family life is unhappy. Perhaps there is room for improvement in our homes. If so we can only secure it by improving ourselves. We cannot drive the rest of the family into improvement even if we are older or wiser or better than they, but perhaps we can lead them. If you are lazy the home will suffer. It is a place for rest, but not for selfish rest. If you are not sympathetic the family will suffer. Home is the place for sympathy and kindness. If you put your own needs and wishes first the life which God meant should be one of mutual service will become one of jealousy and suspicion—a common scramble, too much like that of the pigs in their sty or the fowls in their yard. If you are gloomy and morose what will become of the home cheerfulness that counts so much for influence?

Love without hypocrisy, purity of heart and talk which abhors evil, sympathy, self-control, service, cheerfulness, worship, hospitality—see whether any home can be at its best without these; and where you feel a lack strive for Christ's honor to repair it. And remember that he is always ready to help you for the asking.

Parallel verses: Read 2 John and 3 John; Psalm 68: 6; 1 Peter 1: 22; 1 Cor. 13: 5–8; Heb. 13: 1, 2.

LIFE THROUGH DEATH.

Are there any dead churches down your way? A devout colored preacher, whose heart was aglow with missionary zeal, gave notice to his congregation that in the evening an offering would be taken up for missions and asked for liberal gifts. He had in his congregation one well-to-do man who was very selfish, and who said to him before the service: "Yer gwine ter kill dis church ef yer goes on saying, Give, give! No church can stan' it. Yer gwine ter kill it!" After the sermon the minister said to the people: "Before the service tonight Brother Jones tole me I was gwine ter kill dis yere church ef I kep' a asking yer ter give; but, my brethren, churches doesn't die dat way. Ef dere's anybody knows of a church dat's died 'cause it's been giving too much ter de Lord, I'll be very much obliged ef my brother will tell me whar dat church is, fur Ise gwine ter visit it, an' I'll climb up on de walls of dat church, under de light of de moon, and cry, 'Blessed are de dead dat die in de Lord!'" If they died thus, bless the Lord!

HARTFORD'S NEW PROFESSOR.

We have already chronicled the induction into the chair of Christian apologetics at Hartford Seminary of Prof. Arthur L. Gillett, who for eight years has discharged the duties of this honorable post, first as instructor and then as associate professor. Professor Gillett graduated at Amherst in 1880, at Hartford Seminary in 1884 and until 1888 was a pastor in Wisconsin and Dakota. He has since studied at Berlin, Tübingen and other German universities.

Professor Gillett's inaugural address had for its theme Current Thought about Christianity. He holds that "all true defense or explanation of Christianity must include in its conception of Christianity the fatherhood of God, it must emphasize the personal historic Christ, it must recognize love and righteousness as the essential characteristics of likeness to God. These elements are all represented, though in very diverse ways, in modern explanations of Christianity, and no large and vital theology can come into being which does not recognize these principles in their vital relation to the inner spiritual life of mankind."

PROF. ARTHUR L GILLETT.

He believes that "there is manifest a growing confidence that no fact of science will shake the faith of the Christian, and also a decreasing willingness to let the essence of Christianity be made contingent on any theories of mechanics or physics, or to condition the religious life by any summarizing of the observed method of the operation of God in the material world. They have revealed also an increasing willingness to glorify Christ, somehow conceived, and to make him the center of religious history; together with an acceptance of the essential religiousness of man as an assured fact in the world. Still further, and to my mind very significant for the future, is the markedly growing desire to fix thought on the essentially religious, Christian, phenomena of the inner man—of the heart—and to express Christianity and to sustain its claims on the basis of these. Without ignoring the intellectual side of the religious life, to dwell on the ethico-emotional, rather than the scientific or metaphysical factors as normative for leading to the best apprehension of what the Christian life is. This turning from the without to the within, and from the head to the heart, is a sign hopeful for the future. So long as men are trying to express Christianity in terms of hydrogen, oxygen, and carbon, or are testing its vitality by precision of definition, or are busied solely in trying to bind it fast with a chain of historical evidence as to what once was, there is great danger of missing the thing itself. The air is full of surmise as to the reconstruction of theology which is to occur in the twentieth century. We have no great historical warrant for supposing that there will come into being any large and vital theology except as the result of reflection on a deepened and intensified religious experience. From the time of Jesus till today the historical rule has been that the heart precedes the head in the reformulation of Christian truth."

THE PIQUA CONGREGATIONAL-CHRISTIAN CONFERENCE.

BY REV. E. D. CURTIS.

The meeting was called by a joint committee of the State Christian Conference and the Central Ohio Conference of Congregational Churches, and was held in the Christian Church of Piqua, April 14, 15. The joint committee consisted of Rev. T. M. McWhinney, D. D., Rev. S. S. Newhouse, the Piqua pastor, and Rev. C. J. Jones, D. D., for the Christians, and Rev. Washington Gladden, D. D., Rev. Alexander Milne and Rev. Byron R. Long, all of Columbus, for the Congregationalists. Besides a representation of the churches in Central and Southwesteru Ohio, there were present Dr. D. M. Fiske of Toledo, Rev. J. E. Weston, D. D , of New York, Dr. D. A. Long of Antioch College and Rev. J. J. Summerbell, the editor of the Herald of Gospel Liberty. Drs. J. H. Crum and E. D. Curtis of Indiana were also present, as was Rev. C. J. Jones of the Christian Temple, Marion, Ind.

The program, which was carried out almost without a break, included addresses of greeting and a sermon Tuesday evening by Dr. Gladden. The morning session Wednesday was given up to papers and discussions on the mutual relations of the two denominations. Wednesday afternoon the theme was The Essentials of Christianity, and the communion sermon by Dr. Fiske on the Rise of Christian Liberty. The evening was given to the larger theme of Christian and Social Unity.

The leading contention of Dr. Gladden's elaborate and meaty sermon-lecture was that the disorders of society were brought about by the extreme centrifugal and separating tendencies which were due to very rapid growth, and that the return movement toward social unity should be secured by Christianity; but that the Christian churches themselves had fallen under the law of separation and division the same as other elements of society. The first thing, therefore, was for Christianity to manifest its own unity.

Great care had been taken in the evenly balanced program and the judicious arrangement of names and themes to provide against possible dangers of collision or the development of a sectarian spirit. Ten years ago a joint meeting of Free Baptists and Christians in New York State led apparently to an exaltation of the points of divergence. This meeting, on the contrary, was dominated not so much by the mere tendency to fraternity and the irenical spirit, as by the specific force of the spirit of prophetic Christian unity. It was a significant experiment carried out to a most happy issue. One of the speakers emphasized the common sentiment of the meeting that his subject, How Can We Help Each Other, did not mean "How can we help ourselves to each other," and Dr. J. J. Summerbell's speech, which more than any other set forth the difficulties of organic union, arising from differences of names, traditions, officialism, publishing societies and benevolent corporations, was mildly put in the form of a dream, and the ragged edges were softened by the light of Christian sentiment. One Christian brother even intimated that the generic name by which his denomination was known might not be necessarily put to the front, unless, perchance, there were pagan churches in the locality.

The committee on resolutions formulated no "declaration," but recognizing the validity and spirit of the Syracuse and Haverhill deliverances, made several suggestions as to recognition by the churches of the two bodies of their essential similarity in fraternal exchanges, mutual helpfulness, comity and the holding on a larger scale of representative meetings. It was suggested that where conferences covering the same territory hold two meetings yearly, one of these should be given up to joint conventions.

The very rich and helpful program closed Wednesday evening with addresses by Dr. Weston and Rev. W. J. Turner of Mount Vernon on Unity, the Product of Life, and The Condition of Growth, a backward look on The Gains of Unity in the Nineteenth Century, by Rev. A. Dunlap of the Christian connection, and a closing and most inspiring address on The Gains of Unity in the Twentieth Century, by Rev. Sidney Strong of the Walnut Hills Church, Cincinnati.

Dr. Washington Gladden remarked to the writer at the Syracuse council that mutual conventions would be a means of growth for the spirit of Christian unity, and in a large measure the unique and prophetic spirit of the Piqua meeting is due, both in its inception and leadership, to the well-known author of The Christian League of Connecticut. The southwestern part of Ohio was not largely settled from New England, and while, as at Columbus, there are several points where Congregational life and strength has been carefully developed, it yet may be said that it is not a stronghold of Congregationalism. The Christian connection known sometimes by the plural appellative of the "New Lights" is here centered in considerable power. A membership in Ohio and adjoining regions of Indiana is claimed of some 60,000 or more. The region is rich in agricultural resources and abounds with numerous cities and villages. Antioch College at Yellow Springs, in the days of Horace Mann and since, has conserved valuable educational interests; and the Dayton paper, the well-known Herald of Gospel Liberty, has had circulation and influence in the region. The Piqua meeting, in which the Columbus Congregational pastors and other representative Congregational men united their hearts and voices with the leading spirits of the Christian body, was a most notable one, and one of the leading participants, the enthusiastic Dr. Fiske of Toledo, was moved to mention it as a "great historic meeting." The presence of Prof. A. M. Hall of the Butler College Divinity School of Indianapolis gave an additional suggestion toward a growing unity, and his address was suggestive of a larger coming fruitfulness.

THE BENEVOLENT SOCIETIES AND HARD TIMES.

Experience shows that in every twenty years, or oftener, the country passes through a financial depression. Then business shrinks in volume and profit and every benevolent agency finds that its friends withhold funds, debts are incurred and the work crippled or destroyed. The last three years have been such a time of trial to our home and foreign missionary societies. Beginnings made with considerable expense have to be abandoned; great hardship is entailed upon the workers and promising work must be refused, or, if begun, left as a failure.

Now, with an invested fund or accumulated capital, such as business corporations can rely on for such emergencies, this loss and disaster could be largely avoided. It would seem a dictate of common prudence and good business sagacity to reserve a portion of any large legacies, such as come only at long intervals, for just such times of stringency, when the usual resources are largely curtailed.

Enthusiasm at great annual meetings, or grand uprisings of the constituency under distress will not, in the long run, tide over a protracted season of hard times. Would not our Home Missionary Society do well to heed the lesson of the hour? C. M. P.

PASSING COMMENT.

The annual rally of the Cleveland Club is a good thing for the organization itself, for the city churches and for the denomination.

A few belated reports of Easter on the Pacific coast give pleasing suggestions of the extensive floral displays made possible in that land of sun and flowers.

Ohio conferences find one common theme for their approaching meetings, since this year marks the close of the first century of Congregationalism in the State.

In the midst of their rejoicing over a valuable acquisition, Boston Congregationalists are already saddened by the announcement of the proposed removal of a much beloved leader.

The impression of that well-known evangelist as recently expressed in a Southern State is common but erroneous. There are entire churches in Florida with native born membership. Congregationalism has a great work to do among people who see the inconsistency of maintaining two distinct connectional organizations divided only on sectional lines.

THE ASSOCIATION OF NEW JERSEY.

After an interval of fifteen years this body met with the First Church, Newark, which, with the exception of the one ante-revolutionary church at Chester, is the patriarch of the New Jersey family, albeit a patriarch only forty-five years old. The business transacted consisted chiefly of a carefully drawn, vigorous memorial to the congressmen representing the States of New Jersey, Pennsylvania, Maryland and Virginia—the territory which this association overlaps—to bestir themselves to secure protection and indemnities for our missionaries in Turkey; the granting to the committee on Christian unity of discretional power to invite the "Christian" denomination in this State to join in the meetings of the association; and the reception of two new churches to membership, the Kensington of Philadelphia and the Swedish of Montclair.

The secretary's report revealed healthful gain in membership of the churches, but a decrease in their beneficence, partly due to an increase of home expenditures during the year, notwithstanding the financial stringency. The narratives of the state of religion showed a generally encouraging and progressive state of things.

The meeting was rich in spiritual uplift and practical suggestion, the retiring moderator, Rev. C. L. Goodrich, sounding a high spiritual note in his opening address on Vision and Life. Dr. C. A. Briggs gave, in his thorough and luminous way, an exposition of The Biblical Doctrine of Redemption, showing that while salvation from penalty is the beginning of true ideas regarding redemption, yet salvation from the guilt of sin and from the power of sin are quite as essential; and that salvation from sin itself, while certainly the core of redemption, is far from the whole of it, the Bible being replete with the idea of salvation from evil also, and that not only of a few but of the race, and not only of the race but of the physical earth itself and even of the universe. The sermon by Dr. A. J. Lyman from Col. 3: 11 (the last clause) was an original and inspiring study of what he termed the "genius of the incarnation," especially as seen in Christian doctrine, preaching and organizations. The incarnation, he held, had, according to Paul, a reduplicating nature repeating itself as conditions permitted in the lives of Christians, and also in all the features of real Christianity so that the truly Catholic creeds are, in a way, incarnations of the Christ. He declared he saw no harm in being half a high churchman if the other half was broad! The preaching of the gospel at its best is the Christ speaking again, and the concrete forms in which true Christian life shows itself are new embodiments of the Master.

The practical side of the work of the churches was represented in three parts, by Rev. J. L. Scudder in a carefully prepared, cogent and earnest plea for direct legislation—the referendum system—as the solution of the difficult moral problem in New Jersey, an address that was favorably received, by Rev. T. L. Gulick of Hawaii in an appeal in behalf of the non-Christian world and by Dr. A. H. Bradford in an address on Japan which overflowed with facts and pertinent conclusions. Not less contact with Western Christianity, he declared, is needed by this aggressive, ambitious people, so ancient in its national life, so young in its knowledge of Western civilization and so eager and restless in its thinking, but more contact with that Christianity in its maturest and intellectually strongest forms. Not the new graduate of the theological seminary is needed in Japan now, but the ripest teacher.

One session was devoted to the Sunday school, progressive work in which was admirably treated of on the practical side by Mr. E. F. Meyers of Montclair and on the theoretical by Dr. W. C. Bitting of New York. The latter drew a striking parallel between the firm hold which the Church of Rome has upon its adherents and the half-hearted allegiance of many Protestants and claimed that the difference was due to the wise methods so diligently used in the former body during the impressible period of childhood. The closing session was taken up with the discussion of the religious responsibilities of English-speaking peoples, Dr. F. W. Baldwin dwelling on the world-wide influence and the superior type of Christianity of England and America as laying upon them special duties to the world in the way of Christian civilization, Dr. C. H. Richards making a plea for a forward movement by these peoples in the direction of general international arbitration and Dr. S. M. Newman pointing out that the very complexity of origin and nature of the Anglo-Saxon race, which added so much to its possibilities, laid upon it also special religious obligations.

THE NEW MEXICO ASSOCIATION.

The Congregational work of this Territory comprises six churches, two of which are Mexican, and seven schools, five being Mexican. The distances are great and the rate of travel high, so that a full representation is never expected. Two of the churches and one school were not represented at the annual meeting at Albuquerque, April 15, 16. There were four pastors, three delegates and eleven teachers present. One of the churches not represented is pastorless and the other is 175 miles distant, ninety miles of which must be made by stage. It may be doubted if to any body of workers the annual gathering means more than to these isolated missionaries and teachers, and a unanimous decision was reached to hold semi-annual sessions hereafter.

Reports from the churches and schools were for the most part encouraging. In some schools the attendance has been larger than in former years and in others less, but where the numbers have been smaller the loss has been more than compensated for by greater regularity. The presence of President and Mrs. Slocum of Colorado College, with their thoughtful and encouraging words, was an inspiration. The topics of one session were: Our Christian Academy, Its Function and Needs, by Prof. Elmore Chase; The Relation of Denominational to State Schools, by Prof. Hiram Hadley, president of the territorial university; and The Place of the Pastor in the Training of the Children, by Rev. F. H. Allen. A spirited discussion followed, bearing chiefly upon our local educational institutions, the unanimous opinion being that our denominational work in the line of education in this region is inadequate to the grand opportunity.

An eloquent associational sermon was preached by Rev. P. A. Simpkin. The Spanish educational work occupied the entire forenoon of the second day. Mrs. L. A. Collings, now in her fifteenth year of service as teacher among the Mexicans, read a paper on The Record and Results of Our Spanish Educational Work, which was deemed of so much value for the historical matter it contained that Mrs. Collings was asked to prepare the history of the churches for the next annual meeting. The writer wishes to commend the plan unfolded by Rev. G. E. Birlew, in a paper on The Need of Christian Education Among the Mexicans, for an industrial school and farm. No form of work for these apathetic people promises as good results as this. The Essential Elements in Spanish Work was thoughtfully discussed by Miss Ida L. Frost, who speaks from many years' experience. What might be called a missionary afternoon included the annual meeting of the Ladies' Territorial Union, with a suggestive and helpful address by Mrs. Slocum, papers on The Missionary Spirit by Supt. E. H. Ashmun and on Missions and Christian Endeavor by F. A. Matthes, president of the Territorial C. E. Union.

The closing address by President Slocum set forth the elements essential to successful work in this new West. It was forcible, practical and left a deep impression. E. H. A.

THEOLOGICAL SEMINARIES.

Bangor.

The program of Commencement week will include Professor Gilmore's inaugural and an alumni meeting, with discussions on: The Theological Changes Which Make Wider and Deeper Church Work Imperative, and The Retarding Influence of a Corrupt Municipal Life on the Work of the Church. At the alumni dinner on Wednesday memorials on the late Professor Talcott will be offered.——The seventh Bond lecture last week was on the Evils of Socialism. The eighth and last occurred on Fast Day evening, and was appropriate to the day, the subject being the Work of Pastor, Preacher and Prophet in the Social Regeneration of Society. At the conclusion Professor Sewall made interesting remarks, commending the value of Dr. Smythe's course of lectures.

Andover.

Professor Moore preached in the Seminary Church last Sunday.——Professor Smyth's class in church history has finished its work.——Professor Moore will preach the baccalaureate sermon.——Rev. Henry Blodget, D. D., is giving the Hyde lectures on Christian Missions in China.

Hartford.

In continuation of his chapel talks on the Teachings of Jesus Regarding the Kingdom, Professor Paton spoke last week of the Relation of Christ's Death to the Kingdom, and of Repentance and Belief in Christ as the Conditions of Entrance.——At the general exercises last Wednesday afternoon a students' conference considered the Work of the Minister as Pastor, Preacher and Social Leader.——The attendance at Dr. Walker's Carew lectures on the Religious Life of New England has been large.——The April number of the Seminary Record contains the able inaugural address of Prof. A. L. Gillett on Current Thought About Christianity, and an earnest and scholarly paper on Church Unity by Rev. S. J. Andrews, D. D., author of the well-known Life of Christ. The number also contains the usual book reviews, a report of the meeting of the Inter-Seminary Missionary Alliance and a description of the museum, in which is exhibited the collection of articles from missionary lands belonging to the American Board, together with a large number of curiosities owned by the seminary.

Yale.

The anniversary address to the Senior Class will be given Sunday evening, May 17, in Center Church by Rev. A. H. Bradford, D. D., of Montclair, N. J.——Among the lectures of last week were two on The Fall and Rise of the Scandinavian Peasantry by Professor Sumner.——The Missionary Society was addressed by Rev. N. W. Whittlesey on The Churches and Their Disabled Veterans.——The Leonard Bacon Club discussed the question, Resolved, That the present naval efficiency of the United States should be made equal to that of the first-class powers of Europe.——The Dwight Graduate Fellowship has been awarded to Mr. A. G. Beach, a graduate of Marietta College. Mr. Beach will continue his studies in Germany.——Messrs. H. F. Rall and H. S. Scarborough are regularly supplying the Methodist Episcopal churches at Wallingford and Beacon Falls.——The Graduate Class held a reception on Wednesday evening of last week, at which addresses were made by Messrs. Toomay, Tsunashima and Osborne of the class, and music was rendered by Professor and Mrs. Blackman.——Mr. Leander Coolidge of the Middle Class has been engaged for home missionary work in Nebraska. Mr. George L. Briggs will work in connection with the New Haven City Mission.

Oberlin.

These students have been approbated to preach for a year: Messrs. Loehlin, Mair, Nichols, Travis, Weage, Heathcote, Kubricht, Frecka and Goodhart.——At Commencement examinations will be held May 5 and 6. On the 7th the graduation exercises will be held in the afternoon, with an address by Dr. A. J. F. Behrends, and later the alumni meeting, with supper, and in the evening an address to the alumni by Dr. C. W. Hiatt.

CONFERENCES AND ASSOCIATIONS.

MASS.—Pilgrim Conference held its annual meeting at Duxbury, April 21. The topics were: Why So Few Men Attend Church: the Answer of the Pews, the Answer of the Pulpit, the Remedy; and Christian Enthusiasm, Its Source, Its Use, Its Abuse. An address on The Sabbath, by Rev. Dr. Kneeland of the Sabbath League, aroused much Christian enthusiasm.

The Hampden County Conference, April 22, in Chester, included a strong debate on Church Unity and on The Influence of the Church on the Community Life. Resolutions favoring greater unity among evangelical churches were passed. The sermon was by Rev. J. H. Lockwood. The topic, The Church and Kingdom, was well discussed.

N. Y.—At the meeting of the New York and Brooklyn Association, April 21, the committee on union with the Manhattan Conference brought in the following report, which was unanimously adopted by a rising vote, the Doxology being sung after the vote was taken:

The committee appointed on the third day of June, 1895, to confer with a similar committee of the Manhattan Conference, if appointed, for the purpose of securing a union of the two bodies in one conference, submit the following report:

Such a committee of conference was appointed by the Manhattan Conference, the two committees met together and have agreed to recommend a union of the two bodies on the following basis:

1. The adoption of the constitution and standing rules of the Manhattan Conference.
2. The name of said united body to be the Manhattan-Brooklyn Conference.

Your committee recommend the ratification of this agreement by the adoption of the following resolutions. Similar resolutions will be recommended by the committee of the Manhattan Conference for adoption by that conference at its next meeting.

Whereas, The result of the conference of the joint committees of the New York and Brooklyn Association and the Manhattan Conference has been an agreement on their part to recommend a union of the two bodies under the constitution and standing rules of the Manhattan Conference and with the name of the Manhattan-Brooklyn Conference of Congregational Churches. Therefore Resolved, That the New York and Brooklyn Association cordially adopts said recommendation and designates the audience room of the Congregational church in which the Manhattan Conference holds its next regular meeting as the place, and 8 o'clock of May 14, 1896, as the time when this union, under the constitution and rules of the Manhattan Conference, shall be formally effected, by simple response to a roll-call of all the churches now constituting the Manhattan Conference and Brooklyn Association.

Resolved, That the name of the conference shall be the Manhattan-Brooklyn Conference of Congregational Churches.

Resolved, That when we adjourn we adjourn subject to the call of the scribe, and that as soon as he can ascertain from the officers of the Manhattan Conference the place of the meeting for the perfection of this union he notify the ministers and delegates present at this meeting, and all the churches not here represented.

Resolved, That the scribe call together the ministerial members of this association in October, 1896, for the purpose of considering what measures, if any, shall be taken for the organization of a purely ministerial association and that he be and hereby is authorized to grant in the interim letters of dismission to any ministerial members who may apply for them.

A similar report will be made to the Manhattan Conference May 14, when there is no doubt that the union will be consummated.

O.—Central North Conference met, April 21, 22, in Mansfield. Topics were: Gaining and Training Church Members, The Ministry of the Spirit, Observance of Passion Week, The Child and the Church, The Present Call to Disciples and How to Keep the Old Gospel New. There was a sermon, woman's missionary hour and a report of the state of religion. The missionary societies were represented by Secretaries Herrick and Fraser. A good majority of the 24 churches sent delegates.

Cleveland Conference held the most largely attended city meeting for several years, April 14, 15, with Olivet Church, the youngest and smallest in the conference. Prof. E. I. Bosworth gave the opening address, and three-minute reports from the churches constituted one of the most interesting features. Eleven students of Oberlin Seminary were approbated to preach, and the examination occupied nearly all of one session. Rev. R. G. Hutchins, D. D., gave an inspiring address on The Joys of Ministration. The communion service was followed by three addresses of unusual power upon The Passion and Pentecost.

Medina Conference met with the church in Lafayette, April 22, 23. The subjects were: The Y. P. S. C. E. Fifteen Years After, The Progress of Religious Thought, The First Century of Congregationalism in Ohio, The Second Century, The Present Attitude of Scientific Thought Toward Religion, Foreign Missions, and The Office and Duties of the Pastor.

NEB.—The Republican Valley Association held its last meeting at Indianola, April 14, 15. The sermon was by Rev. D. R. James. In a symposium on The Work of the Holy Spirit, His Office as a Revealer of Truth, and His Presence in the Hearts of Men were considered. Other topics were: The Year of Jubilee, Hindrances in Church Work and Their Remedy, Sunday School Work, Home Missions and Pastoral Visitation. The woman's hour was one of deep interest. Reports from the churches as a whole were encouraging.

ORE.—The Mid-Columbia Association met at Weston, March 31–April 2. Supt. A. J. Bailey preached the sermon. The general theme was The Holy Spirit; subdivisions: As an Equipment for Service, As Comforter and Guide, As the Revealer of Christ; and the papers were followed by a conference on How He May Be Obtained. Dr. J. K. McLean, president of Pacific Seminary, spoke ably on The Mission of Congregationalism to the Community and the State, and also presented the claims of the seminary. The attendance was large and the presence of the Holy Spirit evident. Reports from the churches were highly encouraging. The societies for home and foreign missionary work were well represented.

CAL.—The Bay Conference by a vote of 49 to 32 has suspended Rev. Dr. C. O. Brown of the First Church, San Francisco, until he can clear himself from charges of ungentlemanly and unministerial conduct.

CLUBS.

MASS.—The Worcester Club observed Patriots' Day, April 20, with ladies' night, and the attendance was fully 300. Pres. S. B. L. Penrose of Whitman College gave the address, describing the work of Marcus Whitman and the college founded in his honor.

At the last meeting of the North Bristol Club Rev. R. G. Woodbridge read an interesting paper on Sociability in the Church. The club is growing in numbers.

R. I.—The Providence Club held its April meeting for members only, with about 150 in attendance. The much agitated question as to a limitation of the membership to 300 was disposed of unfavorably.

O.—The Cleveland Club for three years has held an annual rally as the closing meeting of the season with one of the churches. Admission is by tickets distributed free among the churches of the city, there is no supper as at the other meetings, and a strong, popular program is presented. This year the meeting was with the First Church, and Rev. C. E. Dickinson, D. D., of the First Church, Marietta, gave a fine address on One Hundred Years of Congregationalism in Ohio, and Rev. C. H. Taintor of Chicago presented, to the very great satisfaction of all, his lecture on early Congregational history, entitled From Scrooby Manor House to Plymouth Rock. Dr. Dickinson illustrated his address with several Marietta views, and Secretary Taintor showed the remarkably fine collection of views which he has carefully gathered.

ILL.—The Chicago Club at its last meeting celebrated ladies' night and heard addresses on the city missions. The speakers were Drs. F. A. Noble, E. F. Williams and Professor Mackenzie.

NEW ENGLAND.

Boston.

A largely attended reception given by Mr. R. H. Stearns at the Vendome Hotel on the evening of April 22 gave an opportunity to about 300 prominent clergymen and business men to meet Dr. W. H. Davis, the new pastor of the Eliot Church, Newton. Mr. Stearns and Mayor Cobb of Newton assisted the pastor in receiving. The suburban churches, especially in the Newtons, were well represented, and Dr. Davis was thus enabled to form many new acquaintances under happy auspices. Beautiful floral decorations were abundant in the reception-room and attractive musical selections were rendered.

Union. After a pastorate of eight years of energetic service, Dr. Nehemiah Boynton resigned last Sunday to accept a call to the First Church, Detroit, Mich. The resignation takes effect on the eighth anniversary of the beginning of the pastorate. Dr. Boynton's letter to his people was full of pleasant memories of the former relations of pastor and church and of the present complete harmony between them. In many lines of Congregationalism and other interests Dr. Boynton's removal will be deeply felt.

Massachusetts.

BROCKTON.—A new organization, the Waldo Congregational Church, was completed April 15, the ougrowth of a movement inaugurated about three years ago by the Porter Church. It has been under the special leadership of Rev. R. L. Rae, the assistant pastor. The enterprise from the start has met with great success, and has been largely helped by the gift of a neat and tasteful chapel, which, with the lot on which it stands, was generously presented by one of the leading manufacturers of Brockton and his wife. Besides regular preaching services and a Sunday school there have been organized a ladies' association and a Christian Endeavor Society, both proving active and efficient auxiliaries of the work. The congregation averages 200 weekly, the Sunday school numbers 225 members, the young people's society over 40 and the church is a harmonious and enthusiastic body of Christian workers. The membership numbers 51, 32 of whom are from the Porter Church. The sermon was preached by Rev. F. A. Warfield, and the prayer of recognition was by Rev. C. A. Hilton. The church has extended a call to Rev. Mr. Rae; he has accepted and will soon be installed.

FALMOUTH.—First. The 100th anniversary of the Paul Revere bell was celebrated April 19, 20. The bell was purchased of Paul Revere in 1796 and hangs in the belfry of the meeting house. The program for the exercises included special elaborate music, two sermons on appropriate themes, and patriotic accounts and poems relative to Paul Revere. The centennial address was by Dr. W. E. Barton of Boston. Katharine Lee Bates wrote a poem for the occasion. Rev. C. H. Washburn is pastor.

WELLESLEY.—Rev. L. W. Hicks, who recently resigned, took that action to the surprise of his congregation. He proposes to remove to Hartford, Ct., and does not plan to resume pastoral work at once.

GEORGETOWN.—First. The church is thankful for the improvement in health of the pastor, Rev. H. R. McCartney.——Memorial. This edifice, the gift of George Peabody, has recently been marked by a fitting tablet beside the front doors.

NEWBURYPORT.—Prospect Street. During the year 11 families have been added to the parish, the morning congregations have increased in attendance more than one-third, the attendance at Sunday school has increased in like proportion, the C. E. Society has doubled its active membership, 18 persons have been admitted to membership and five more will be added in May.——Belleville. The teachers and officers of the Sunday school invited the officers and teachers of all other schools in the city to a social conference recently. The discussion of various departments of Sunday school work, a comparison of methods and exchange of ideas occupied the time. This profitable evening, it is hoped, inaugurated a new way of co-operation. A mural tablet in memory of the first pastor of this church will soon be erected by generous bequest of his granddaughter, Miss Anna E. Rousseau, recently deceased.

MARLBORO.—Union held services appropriate to Patriots' Day last week Sunday. The G. A. R., Co. F. of the Sixth Regiment, the Sons of Veterans and the Ladies' Relief Corps, invited to the service, filled the house.

WHITINSVILLE.—The church celebrated the 25th anniversary of its pastor, Rev. J. R. Thurston, April 20. At the reception nearly 700 persons brought congratulations. A gift of the parishioners was offered in the form of a check for $2,025. From a committee of the Massachusetts House of Representatives a letter was read and from that body, of which Mr. Thurston is a member, he received a handsome crystal mantel clock. A banquet followed the reception.

WORCESTER.—Central. Rev. E. M. Chapman has sailed for Europe for a two months' trip.——The funeral of Rev. A. C. Childs, who for several years has been retired, occurred last week. Mr. Childs graduated from Yale, has held several pastorates in the West and in Vermont, and is well known in ministerial gatherings in the city.——Summer Street closed its industrial school last week. The school is supported by the Washburn fund. Over 200 scholars were enrolled. The garments made are given away.——Armenian. Rev. C. G. Kemalyan has resigned his pastorate. The church is largely supported by the City Missionary Society.

GRAFTON.—Union. Encouraging reports come from this church as to its growth and prosperity. It was originally the Saundersville Church, organized in 1860, but, having no home of its own, worshiped in halls till last year when it decided to build. It has now a well-equipped building, with only a small debt. All have worked nobly in paying for the edifice, a society of ladies called the Earnest Workers, at a fair netting nearly $600 for the edifice. The new building is in a central location to accommodate the people of the villages of Fisherville, Farnumville and Saundersville. The congregations have lately increased 100 per cent., the attendance of the Sunday school 50 per cent. and the other organizations connected with the church in like manner. A Boys' Brigade has been formed and a Men's League was started about a year ago. Hardly a church in the vicinity has made greater advancement than this during the past year. The present membership is 108. Rev. David Howie is pastor.

SPRINGFIELD.—First. The annual collection for the benefit of the American Board, taken April 19, amounted to $925.——North. A fine crayon portrait of Rev. R. G. Green, a former pastor, has been presented by the artist, Mrs. H. A. Robinson, and is placed in the chapel. Deacon S. K. Foster celebrated his 80th birthday April 25. The Men's Club, which has flourished through the winter, closed its series of meetings April 21 with a banquet, to which the lady friends of the members were invited. Weekly meetings have been held, the discussions being on current political and other questions. Joint debates have also been held with clubs from other churches.——St. John's. This is the only colored Congregational church in the city. The entire indebtedness has now been wiped out, the last amount, $330, having been raised by the other Congregational churches of the city. Rev. J. W. Tolliver is pastor. Ten persons have been received to membership since the beginning of the year.——Faith. A new organ has been placed in the church and was dedicated last week.——Park. Resolutions were passed last week on the death of Deacon S. M. Coe.

Maine.

GORHAM.—First. The annual report of this church, Rev. G. W. Reynolds, pastor, shows prosperity. There is a fund of $21,333, the income of which meets the expense of the salary. Other expenses are to be raised by the envelope system. A chapel costing $10,000 is projected and funds are being collected for the purpose, and a committee of 15 will take charge of the building business.

TURNER.—Evangelists Folger and Gibson, who have been holding successful meetings, closed their service with a tender and impressive union service. Some persons have expressed a desire to begin a Christian life and Christians have been revived and strengthened.

EASTPORT.—Rev. C. S. Holton was recently the recipient of a beautiful silver water set, consisting of four pieces and given by the teachers of the Eastport schools in appreciation of his service as superintendent of schools for two years.

KENNEBUNKPORT —The young people have raised $100 for parsonage repairs, and they propose a parsonage improvement society to care for the welfare of their pastor, Rev. H. A. Merrill.

THOMASTON.—The pastor, Rev. C. D. Boothby, is absent for recuperation from an illness of some weeks past. He has been granted an extra vacation of a month with salary continued.

The work of the coast missionary, Capt. H. J. Allen, is valuable and interesting. Rev. Francis Southworth of Bethel Church, Portland, takes much interest in it and assists as much as he can. He has a little sloop and with his wife coasts about, holding meetings and organizing Sunday schools, and especially distributing religious literature, also clothing where needed. There are four church organizations, but no pastor in his circuit, and meetings are held in schoolhouses chiefly. There is much spiritual interest at several points, and many are helped who have few or no religious privileges but for this self-denying work.

New Hampshire.

WESTMORELAND.—Misses Milton and Abell, the trained district workers of the N. H. Missionary Society, have lately concluded a series of house to house visitations and neighborhood meetings, which were greatly blessed to the quickening of Christians and the awakening of a general interest. A number of conversions occurred, including several heads of families and persons in middle life. With such additions as are expected the church will be encouraged and strengthened. The workers by their consecration and methods gained a strong hold on the affections of the people, and fully justified the wisdom of putting them into the field.

ROCHESTER.—For the benefit of the Y. M. C. A. a canvass has lately been made for subscriptions under the auspices of the State executive committee, resulting in pledges of $1,300, with the prospect that that sum will be increased by membership fees to $1,900 or more. This will insure a general secretary and additional privileges.

HILL.—Following an increasing spirit of harmony and good fellowship in the church, a quiet religious interest has been awakened, and six persons have already made known their purpose to lead a Christian life. A Junior Endeavor Society has been organized with encouraging prospects.

WASHINGTON.—Much interest has been manifested among the people during the past few months, as shown by the increased attendance at all the regular meetings. It is expected several will soon unite with the church, much to its encouragement and strength.

NASHUA.—Pilgrim. The church and community have met with a great loss in the death of Hon. Edward O. Blunt after a three days' illness. He was an estimable man, had held honorable offices and wielded a commanding influence.

LYNDEBORO.—The church, in voting at the annual meeting to call for less aid from the Home Missionary Society, has taken an advanced step toward self-support, which it is hoped will be assumed at no distant day.

CORNISH.—Universal regret is felt at the removal of Rev. J. T. Jackson, for 22 years the pastor. He held a warm place in the affections of his people, and wielded a wide influence throughout the town.

FARMINGTON.—A series of special evangelistic services, continuing four weeks under the lead of J. B. Jordan, resulted in great quickening to the church and a good number of conversions.

KEENE.—First. The pastor is giving a series of Sunday evening discourses on Some Lessons of the Resurrection Life of Jesus. Personality Not Arrested by Death was recently given.

SOMERSWORTH.—Hon. D. G. Rollins of New York has given the church a parsonage costing $10,000.

Vermont.

ORWELL.—The Ladies' Aid Society has contributed in 25 years $4,000 for benevolent purposes. Their quarter-centennial anniversary was recently celebrated by a social gathering.

Rhode Island.

PROVIDENCE.—Union. A beautiful pamphlet is the souvenir of the 25th anniversary of this strong church. Fine half-tone pictures of Dr. Nutting and wife, of all previous pastors, of present deacons and trustees and of other department leaders illustrate its pages, together with several views of the building, outside and interior.——Pilgrim. The Men's Club has managed a course of lectures this spring, issuing 1,000 complimentary tickets to be distributed by members and inviting a silver offering at the close of each lecture. Rev. C. L. Morgan, D. D., of Jamaica Plain, Boston, gave the last lecture on Egypt. This church has a Children's Foreign Mission Society called Little Pilgrims, that has celebrated its 19th anniversary. It has a cradle roll, in which are children of former members, and graduation from this occurs at the age of four years, with special exercises. Miss Winsor has been its faithful leader from the beginning. Graduates from the Little Pilgrims are the nucleus of a recently formed Young Ladies' Mission Society called the Laurie Guild, now numbering about 30 members.

BARRINGTON CENTER.—By the will of Lucian B. Kendall, late of this town, bequests of $200 each are made to the American Board, the American Tract Society and the A. M. A., and $100 each to the C. H. M. S. and the Education Society.

Connecticut.

NEW HAVEN.—A new branch of the Railroad Y. M. C. A. is being organized. Its charter membership will be about 725. Plans are being made for providing all the ordinary attractions.——Dwight Place. The annual report shows that during the year 33 persons joined by letter and 19 on confession. The present membership is 804, a net gain of 25. The Sunday contributions to various charities were $967. Contributions by the various church societies were $1,443. The current expenses were $8,218. The new assistant pastor, Mr. P. A. Johnson, will assume his duties May 1.——Howard Avenue. A bronze memorial tablet has been placed in the meeting house in memory of the first pastor, Rev. O. H. White, D. D. It is the gift of his daughter, Mrs. L. B. W. Wales of Boston.

KILLINGWORTH.—The historic old horse sheds which have surrounded the church for so many years have been removed on account of their decayed condition. A few years ago every pleasant Sunday found all the stalls occupied; lately but few of them have been used. The population of Killingworth has dwindled considerably during the past few years, and the problem of the support of the country church is beginning to make itself felt here as elsewhere.

WALLINGFORD.—Rev. Asher Anderson of Meriden, chaplain of the Second Regiment, C. N. G., addressed the local military company on a recent Sunday evening, all members of it being present in uniform. Last week Sunday Company G, at South Manchester, enjoyed a similar treat in the form of a talk by Chaplain H. H. Kelsey of the Fourth Church, Hartford.

DANBURY.—First. The bi-centennial committee have decided upon May 27 as the date for holding the celebration attending the 200th anniversary of the church. Several of the former pastors will be present and take part in these ceremonies and an elaborate program is under course of preparation. The services on the Sunday preceding and following will be appropriate.

BROOKFIELD.—The fellowship meeting last week was largely attended, 75 guests and delegates being present. Topics were: The Church as a Recruiting Station, What Women Can Do, Service, the Life of the Church. Rev. F. A. Johnson preached the sermon.

MIDDLE STATES.

New York.

NEW YORK.—Pilgrim. The close of 25 years of pastoral work by Dr. S. H. Virgin was celebrated last week. Brief addresses were given at the reception to the pastor and his wife, and the Ladies' Society presented a handsome cabinet inlaid with pearl. The anniversary sermon was preached by Dr. Virgin last Sunday.

SYRACUSE.—The annual meeting of the Ladies' Branch and Home Missionary Union of the Central Association was held with Good Will Church, April 14. The meeting was the first of the kind and the attendance quite good. Excellent addresses were given.

SMYRNA.—Mr. F. W. Avery, a former deacon of this church, sailed April 22 as missionary to the Congo country under the auspices of the International Missionary Alliance. Before his departure from town the Y. P. S. C. E. of the church gave him a reception.

MAINE.—The trustees of the church have conveyed the cemetery it has used ever since its organization to a new cemetery society.

New Jersey.

UPPER MONTCLAIR.—This church has been prosous during the year. Twenty-five persons have united with it. Its beneficence has increased one-third, amounting to $2,200. The offertory calendar system is used and is found effective. The Sunday school now has a high average attendance. The Endeavor Societies have a part in missionary work in Japan, India and China and in the People's Palace and the Whittier House, Jersey City. The monthly concert, a new feature, has proved helpful. Gifts have been made to the stricken Armenians and to a neighboring hospital as well as to the regular missionary causes. The present building is proving too small for the congregation and the question of a new or larger building is agitated. A pleasant feature recently was a combined annual meeting and church supper to which every family in the congregation was personally invited.

JERSEY CITY.—Waverley. A considerable floating debt, incurred during the past three years, has just been liquidated and some funds have been accumulated towards paying off the old mortgage. Nineteen persons have united with the church in a year, 18 on confession, and a score or more besides have been converted in recent evangelistic meetings. Sixteen of the latter were from the prosperous Sunday school.

GLEN RIDGE.—This church greatly enjoyed its Holy Week services conducted by Dr. Edward Judson, assisted by an excellent male quartet from Union Seminary. Twenty-five persons were received into the church on the 12th, 14 on confession. A Lend a Hand Club for boys has been formed, with excellent results. It is social, literary and religious.

PERTH AMBOY.—This, the only Swedish church among a considerable Swedish population, has been without a pastor for a year. It has now called Rev. C. O. Sjoberg, from Chicago Seminary, and is looking forward hopefully with increasing spiritual interest to his coming.

Pennsylvania.

PLYMOUTH.—Puritan, in spite of the hard times, has finished and paid for the foundation of its chapel. It has received 17 new members on confession since Jan. 1, and its Sunday school has increased 65 per cent. The C. E. Society recently made a donation of $70 for the work of the church.

KANE.—The Ladies' Aid Society has recently held an "earned dollar experience meeting," each member reporting the method by which a dollar or more had been earned in the time prescribed. The earnings amounted to about $50.

SCRANTON.—Plymouth celebrated its 14th anniversary the last of March with special services. Besides the sermons by the pastor there was a roll-call meeting, about 160 members responding. A thank offering of $106 was made.

PITTSBURG.—Puritan has lost four valued members by death within a month. The young people held a "Washington supper" recently at which they raised $88 for the church.

EBENSBURG.—Rev. R. S. Jones was awarded a prize of $25 at the Scranton Eisteddfod for the best essay on The New Woman—Once Our Superior, Now Our Equal.

OLIPHANT.—A new organ has been obtained for $400. A collection was recently made for the Armenian sufferers.

THE SOUTH.

Alabama.

SELMA.—This church, Rev. T. J. Bell, pastor, has witnessed one of the most successful revivals in this city for years. A few weeks ago Rev. James Wharton, the A. M. A. evangelist, held a two weeks' series of meetings, which were abundantly successful. There were about 400 professed conversions. About 40 persons have united with this church, 60 with the Presbyterian, and several with the Baptist and Methodist churches.

Florida.

A recent accession to Congregational ranks is Rev. J. L. Brandon, coming from the Methodist ministry. He is a native Floridian and thoroughly in sympathy with Congregationalism. The Miami field to which he goes is, for the next 12 months, one of the most important in the State.

PALM BEACH.—D. L. Moody recently spoke here and at West Palm Beach. He expressed surprise that the church of the Pilgrim Fathers should be found in Florida.

LATANA.—This new church, just organized, has absorbed an entire class of the M. E. South Church. Rev. Henry Cartledge is pastor.

THE INTERIOR.

Ohio.

ROCKPORT.—Rev. C. W. Rice, a graduate of Oberlin Seminary, after a successful pastorate in Port Huron, Mich., has taken the pastorate of this suburban church, three miles west of the city limits of Cleveland. Suburban electric car service is increasing the growth of this place, and the church gives promise of steady progress under a resident pastor. An attractive parsonage is finished, the land for it being given by one of the church members, and $1,000 being left as a legacy by another member.

AURORA.—This church has had a good year. Since last June 40 persons have been received to membership, 31 on confession. During this time Rev. E. R. Fuller has been serving the church while completing his course at Oberlin. He has been called for another year.

Indiana.

PORTLAND.—Liber Memorial. A new brick edifice was dedicated April 19. This old organization has felt the necessity of relocation in the county seat and will use its former building, a mile and a half from the center, only in a subsidiary way. The new house has a wing and tower and is 50 feet each way. The pulpit is in the corner and the floor bowled. Extra money was raised to purchase a fine bell. The cost has been nearly $4,000. Many persons were present at dedication. Rev. L. A. Townsend preached the dedication sermon and led the people in an effort at consecrated giving to wipe out the debt. During the day $1,500 were subscribed which, with $500 aid promised by the C. C. B. S., will complete the payments on the building. Rev. A. E. Pierce is the pastor.

ANGOLA.—Prof. William Shaw, a lay evangelist, has recently assisted Rev. J. T. Robert in a series of meetings continuing three weeks. Great interest was manifested and the meetings were throughout helpful. Twenty-eight persons will be received to membership, including many heads of families.

FREMONT.—Rev. C. E. Grove has just closed a two-years' pastorate here, during which time he also served the Jamestown church. His recent pastorate resulted in large accessions and the two churches are stronger in many ways than before.

Michigan.

SAGINAW.—First has just received 22 into membership, 21 on confession. Over $100 were raised privately last week for the relief of Miss Shattuck, missionary of the American Board in Turkey, and a bond or two of the bonded debt is being retired at this time. The regular quarterly working men's meeting was held last Sunday evening, with an address by the president of the local Central Labor Union on The Christianity of Trades Unionism, and an address by the pastor.

Wisconsin.

TWO RIVERS.—The deferred annual meeting of the church was held on April 20. Twenty members were received during 1895. Holiday gifts of his people made the pastor a life member of the Wisconsin State Historical Society. There are two congregations connected with this church, one in the town of Two Creeks. In this town, on a site about one-half mile from Lake Michigan, there was laid on Thursday afternoon, April 16, the first foundation stone of a house of worship, or "Endeavor home," that is practically paid for before it is built. No help is asked from the Church Building Society. There is no other house of worship of any denomination in the whole town, nor has there ever been. For the new building there has already been bought the organ, which, until a few weeks ago, was used in the Two Rivers church. It is still in excellent condition. For its own use the village congregation has bought a new organ that was put in during the first week of Passiontide.

SHULLSBURG.—This church, after some time of weakness, has put on new life. Since the coming of Rev. A. J. Hayner a new house of worship, costing $7,500, has been dedicated, 23 persons have become members, a vigorous Y. P. S. C. E. has been organized, the Sunday school is prosperous and growing and the congregations are good.

LANCASTER.—This church has called Rev. T. J. Brown of the Presbyterian church of Reedsburg. Formerly of the Congregational church at Waupun, he went to Reedsburg about two years ago.

DARLINGTON.—This church is doing a grand work under the lead of Rev. J. W. Frizzell. The congregations are large and a growing interest is manifested.

THE WEST.

Missouri.

ST. LOUIS.—Third. The corner stone of the new edifice was laid April 23. The pastor, Rev. H. C. Vrooman, presided, Major C. P. Walbridge gave the address and neighboring pastors assisted.——Maplewood. Rev. T. T. Holway, a graduate of Oberlin College and Chicago Seminary, entered upon his work here April 19.——Hope. It has just been decided to secure a new location for the edifice two blocks south of the present site. More room for the work has long been needed.

Iowa.

ROCKFORD.—At the last annual meeting Rev. C. E. Taggart tendered his resignation, to take effect April 6, after a five years' pastorate. He earnestly desired the co-operation of every member to make the last three months the best of the five years. Following the Week of Prayer union meetings were held for four weeks. Mr. Taggart has striven faithfully to raise the church to a higher spiritual standard and is a close follower and faithful teacher of the principles of his Master. He is held in high esteem by his people. During the last year the church raised $329 for benevolences, the largest amount ever given in a year during its history. Rev. E. L. Ely of Omaha, Mr. Taggart's successor at Red Cloud, Neb., has been called to follow him here. At present Mr. Taggart is ill at his home in Rockford and will be obliged to take a vacation before taking up work elsewhere.

Minnesota.

RANDALL.—A series of revival meetings has been held, Rev. D. W. Cram of Staples assisting. Storms interfered with the success of the meetings. Lots have been secured and a building will be erected at once. The pastor, Mr. W. R. McClane, is caring for one or two out-stations near by. The Parker church is under the care of Mr. D. A. Randall.

SHERBURNE.—During the year's pastorate of Rev. C. E. Walker the church has come to self-support. There have been revival interest and accessions at both Lake Belt and the home field. A hearty call has been given to Dr. Walker to remain at increased salary.

WORTHINGTON.—The house of worship has been renovated within and without, the citizens aiding liberally, and the work will be completed in time for the Mankato Conference, to meet next month. All expenses have been provided for and all debts paid.

LAKELAND.—Mr. J. T. Cunningham closes his work, but Evangelist A. A. Davis, a former pastor, is upon the ground and has raised a subscription for repairing the meeting house and parsonage and otherwise improving the property.

Kansas.

HYMER.—Rev. G. M. Pfeiffer, the pastor at Diamond Springs and Six Mile, recently held a series of meetings at this neighboring railroad station destitute of religious services of any kind. Several conversions resulted, and it is probable that a meeting house will soon be erected near Hymer Station. The membership at Diamond Springs has increased to 53.

ALMA.—Rev. D. R. Steiner, for six years the successful pastor, having accepted a call to Olathe, the Alma church passed resolutions commending his large service here, which will continue to endear him to the people. A hearty welcome was accorded the new pastor, Rev. George Kettering, who began work early in April.

LAWRENCE.—Union evangelistic services, under the direction of Dr. W. H. Wharton of Baltimore, are being held in the Armory, which is crowded, about 1,500 persons attending on Sunday evening. There is a deep and growing interest, with daily conversions.

MANHATTAN.—The contribution raised for the C. H. M. S. exceeded by more than 50 per cent. the amount requested by the State committee. In proportion to its membership and ability this church is one of the most liberal givers to missions in the State.

FAIRMOUNT.—Twenty-one persons have been added to the roll during the past year and the outlook is encouraging. One of the members recently held revival services at an out-station, resulting in 47 hopeful conversions.

BROOKVILLE.—The Congregational and Methodist churches having held union revival services, with excellent results in all respects, 31 persons were received by the Congregationalists March 22. This increases the membership to 59.

BALA.—Revival meetings recently held by Rev. John Izard, pastor at Cleburne, resulted in 30 hopeful conversions, and 15 persons have been received into the church Mr. Izard will serve both these churches until fall.

VALLEY FALLS.—The meeting house has been painted and carpeted. It has now 139 members, who have called the present pastor, Rev. Edward Skinner, to continue without limit of time.

LAWRENCE.—Second (Colored). Work has been renewed after a considerable interim. A Sunday school of 50 members, a weekly prayer meeting and a teachers' meeting are regularly held.

OSBORNE AND DOWNS.—Within the past four months these churches—now under one pastorate—have received 44 new members, 23 having united at Osborne and 21 at Downs.

St. Mary's has decided to enlarge its building, adding classrooms to accommodate its growing Sunday school and Y. P. S. C. E.——The young church at Seabrook has made individual pledges amounting to $100 for benevolences for the coming year.——Tonganoxie has received 15 members within the past three months, and is now repairing its building at a cost of $150.

Nebraska.

WEEPING WATER.—Rev. C. S. Harrison, on account of overwork, has been obliged to go to the mountains for rest. Superintendent Bross preached April 19, when the annual offering to the C. H. M. S. was made. The church is extending its work along aggressive lines and making progress in paying its debt.

STANTON.—A special communion service, April 19, followed the evangelistic meetings of Mr. Billings. Ten persons were welcomed to membership, eight on confession. Three of these were from the Junior C. E. Rev. H. M. Lyman is pastor.

South Dakota.

BADGER.—This church is in great need of a little chapel such as could be built for $800, and will make every effort to raise the amount. For two years the crops have been light.

Mr. E. P. Swartout, who for two years has served acceptably at Letcher, Lisbon, Bethel and Firesteel, now closes his work. At Lisbon especially there has been recent growth, while progress has characterized the whole field.——Mr. Harvey Lyman, son of Superintendent Lyman of Black Hills and Wyoming, will begin work at South Shore, Mazeppa and Troy after his graduation at Yankton in June.——Mr. E. F. Lyman, a Yankton graduate and now of Chicago Seminary, recommences work at Wheeler and West Missouri River for the summer months.

New Mexico.

ATRISCO.—Mexican. It is difficult to get the Mexicans to contribute toward their own support or to benevolences, because of their poverty and because in the Catholic Church they have been forced to pay. It is therefore gratifying to report $26 raised for benevolences during the last association year.

GALLUP.—Twenty persons have been received to membership, making 42 accessions since Jan. 1. The Sunday school organized Jan. 1 has had an average attendance of 79 during its first quarter.

A large Junior C. E. Society has been organized at Albuquerque, and divided into two sections.

PACIFIC COAST.

California.

SAN FRANCISCO.—Bethany. The infant son in a Christian Chinese family was baptized Easter Sunday. Dr. W. C. Pond, the pastor, will spend a month in visiting the Chinese missions in the southern part of the State.——In the extreme western part of the city, 21 persons united to form a church which was recognized by council April 9. This is the 11th church of San Francisco. Mrs. S. B. Cooper's Bible class has pledged $300 and a friend $100 more toward the support of a minister the first year. Mr. Sidney R. Yarrow of Pacific Seminary is now supplying the pulpit.

SAN MATEO.—On Easter Sunday, though stormy, $62 were given to home missions, the largest offering in the history of the church to that cause. The pastor, Rev. F. V. Jones, is suffering with his eyes and is obliged to give up work temporarily. His people have granted him a vacation of three or four months, continuing his salary and supplying the pulpit.

The Market Street Church, Oakland, and the church in Alameda, have recently introduced individual communion cups and both are much pleased with the change.——Rev. H. E. Banham of Fresno is delivering, Sunday evenings, an interesting course of lectures on Congregationalism.

Several C. E. Societies observed Easter by holding sunrise prayer meetings.——Children's Day will be celebrated May 24 by the Congregational churches in this State.——There are in California 1,382 Sunday schools of all denominations, including 14,788 officers and teachers and 118,476 children.

Oregon.

PORTLAND.—First. Since the departure of Dr. Wallace the services have been regular and the attendance as good as at any time within six months. Rev. W. H. Scudder of Norwich, N. Y., is supplying the pulpit for April. Never was the church so exquisitely decorated as on Easter day, when 600 callas, bushels of California poppies, Oregon trilliums and great clusters of Oregon grape, with cedars and trailing acacia, transformed the platform and organ loft into a bower of beauty. The music and sermons were in harmony with their surroundings and the day was one of rejoicing.——Mississippi Avenue. The Sunday school enrollment has increased to 185. Other departments are equally encouraging. A number of Catholic families have joined this church and school.

ASHLAND.—Six new members were received, April 5, the largest number at one time since Rev. E. P. Child's pastorate. The Sunday school attendance averages 82, and the Y. P. S. C. E. is on a better basis than ever before. Prayer meeting attendance has doubled, and a definite improvement in all departments of work is clearly seen from month to month.

HOOD RIVER.—Riverside. An impressive Easter service, with profuse decorations of native wild flowers and special music, drew the largest congregation ever assembled here. Bibles were given to all Sunday school pupils who had not missed attendance in five months. Supt. C. F. Clapp is assisting Rev. J. L. Hershner in special meetings.

GREENVILLE.—After a pastorless year the church has been reorganized, and preaching, Sunday school and Y. P. S. C. E. services are now conducted regularly. Rev. J. M. Beauchamp was the chief instrument in bringing about this improvement. The town is in the center of a large and fertile farming region, thickly settled.

SUNDAY SCHOOL NOTES.

The largest home department reported in the world is found in connection with the Central Congregational school of Chelsea, and numbers upwards of 330, with a superintendent and several visitors.

The Uxbridge Congregational school has been obliged to organize a new home department each year, because the larger portion of those enrolled the previous year entered the regular school. This year they organized one among those too old, feeble or otherwise so situated that they would be unlikely to enter the main school.

Sixteen towns, the largest number in any one district, and containing sixty schools, compose Framingham district, which held its third annual and largest meeting on Friday, March 6, with three sessions. The program was strong and very practical and Pres. G. L. Bartlett kept each of the twenty-nine numbers on time. The secretary, Mrs. F. G. Stearns, reported returns from all but two schools and had discovered several new ones not previously known. Among the strong addresses were those of Rev. F. E. Sturgis, D. D., on the Ideal School, What and Whom to Teach by Rev. D. H. Ela, and Normal Work by A. W. Edson, agent of the State Board of Education. The evening was made particularly interesting and instructive by an address on The Great Christian Manuscripts, or How Our Bible Came, illustrated with the stereopticon. President Bartlett and Secretary Stearns were re-elected and a strong executive committee, representing each town, was chosen, and the town of Mendon welcomed to the district.

CHRISTIAN ENDEAVOR NOTES.

Sweden reports several societies started.

The first Junior Society, that in Tabor, Io., has celebrated its twelfth anniversary.

The president of the union in Liberia, Rev. G. P. Goll, has already started as the delegate to the Washington Convention.

The name of a society in a training school in the Caroline Islands in the native tongue is, literally, "People of good size, imitators of Christ."

For May the subject suggested for the Prayer Chain is, More of the spirit of Christ in home life, to win brothers, sisters and family friends.

As a result of efforts in behalf of floating societies, two captains of British vessels have signed the C. E. pledge, and work among their sailors.

A single society in Toronto, Ont., has furnished seven elders, a missionary to Africa, and five ministers, besides 12 others now studying for the ministry.

At the "surrender meeting" on the last day of the Michigan Convention 40 persons volunteered to go to the foreign field if the opportunity were given them.

The first society in Hangchow, China, formed last November, was made up altogether of women, and had a membership of 25. Soon after a men's society was started, and both have been making good progress.

Paving the streets of San Diego, Cal., on Sundays has been stopped in consequence of efforts by the Endeavorers of the city, and in Saticoy, Cal., a society of only 15 active members put a stop to violations of the Sunday-closing law on the part of the saloons.

A Philadelphia society enrolls as workers the pastor and his wife, 16 out of 20 in the choir, three of the five superintendents of the Sunday school, the secretary and two assistants, the missionary secretary and treasurer, the chorister, three assistant librarians, 33 regular and 29 substitute teachers and the sexton.

Nashville is making strong efforts to secure the International Convention for 1898, and a committee of 15 has been chosen and includes five each of pastors, Endeavorers and business men, among them the mayor, president of the Chamber of Commerce, general manager of the street railway and president of the chief local railway, who is president also of the Tennessee Centennial.

BOLLER, Benj. F., and wife, were tendered a reception by the Tabernacle Ch., Chicago, Ill., April 17, the tenth anniversary of their marriage. An enjoyable feature was the presentation of an onyx clock and other valuable gifts.
DISBROW, Edward D., of West Hanover, Mass., while going to Pilgrim Conference, Duxbury, April 21, was thrown from his bicycle and fractured his collar bone. He was taken to the home of his brother-in-law, Rev. F. W. Manning, in Marshfield.
GARDNER, Rufus P., Hampstead, N. H., has received from a former parishioner a handsome gold watch.
GEARHART, Chas. D., has closed his work in Sheridan, Wyo., and returned to Nebraska.
GEORGE. Edward A., and wife, were given a reception, April 24, by their new people at Willimantic, Ct. Greetings were extended in behalf of the church and the community.
HALLOCK, Leavitt H., and wife, were tendered a farewell reception in the parlors of First Ch., Tacoma, Wn. Mrs. Hallock received from the women of the church a beautiful gold watch.
SMITH, Dr. Sam'l G., pastor of People's Ch., St. Paul, Minn., has been invited to supply Westminster Chapel, London, Eng., for six weeks the coming summer.
TAYLOR, W. S., of Olivet Ch., Cleveland, O., has been seriously ill for nearly two months, and has been taken to a hospital.
WALLACE, Dr. Geo. R., and wife, were cordially welcomed to their new field in Chicago by the members and friends of Pilgrim Ch., who tendered them a largely attended reception.
WAKEFIELD, Frank A., Porter Ch., Brockton, Mass., at the close of his 14 years' pastorate was given a large farewell reception last Friday evening. A gift of $300 in gold was presented him.

OTHER CHRISTIAN WORK.

The new Y. M. C. A. building in Malden, one of the finest in Massachusetts, was dedicated April 22. It is constructed of brick and the trimmings are of brownstone. It cost $94,000. Stores occupy the ground floor and the rest of the building contains a gymnasium, rooms for reading and library purposes, lectures and receptions, and apartments for bicycles and the camera club.

The first State Sunday school covention of Massachusetts in Boston, April 22, was characterized by a good attendance and enthusiasm at all the sessions. The addresses were by Dr. J. L. Hurlburt of New York, Miss B. F. Vella, W. N. Hartshorn, Rev. F. M. Gardner, Dr. W. A. Duncan and Rev. W. T. Perrin. Separate conferences on special themes were conducted and many valuable hints as to best methods were given.

A special series of "theater meetings" conducted by the Brockton Y. M. C. A. is notable in its results. During the 20 weeks the aggregate attendance of men has been 17,885, a weekly average of 894. The largest attendance was 1,338. Nearly 100 men have given evidence of conversion and as many more asked help. The average weekly expense of $43 was nearly met by the collections. No further proofs are needed of the widespread interest in this movement. The association also added 535 new names to its roll. Mr. B. F. Pierce is the new secretary.

WHAT IS GOD?

Some one has said that the incarnation is "at once the cross and the crown of Christian theology, the burden it has to bear, the truth in which it glories." To discard it would be to discard Christianity, for deep in the consciousness of the church has been cherished as the very fountain of her vitality the thought of the divine human Redeemer. Yet when the church has been driven to define how the divine and the human co-exist, how in this one person the human, with all that constitutes human nature, freely works and consists with the free working of what is divine, she can, as Dorner has said, only stammer. And in truth we know too little of one of the factors, God, to expect any perfect solution of the problem of Christ's person. It is only through the incarnation we get at any solid knowledge of God, but it does not, apparently, give us that knowledge of God which enables us to interpret itself. More and more all theological questions are resolving themselves into the one: What is God?—Prof. Marcus Dods.

Susanna Wesley's theory of amusement was: "Whatever weakens your reason, impairs the tenderness of your conscience, obscures your sense of God, or takes off the relish for spiritual things, that thing is sin to you, however innocent it may be in itself."

Boils

It is often difficult to convince people their blood is impure, until dreadful carbuncles, abscesses, boils, scrofula or salt rheum are painful proof of the fact. It is wisdom now, or whenever there is any indication of blood, to take Hood's Sarsaparilla, and prevent such eruptions and suffering.

Impure

"I had a dreadful carbuncle abscess, red, fiery, fierce and sore. The doctor attended me over seven weeks. When the abscess broke the pains were terrible, and I thought I should not live through it. I heard and read so much about Hood's Sarsaparilla that I decided to take it, and my husband, who was suffering with boils, took it also. It soon purified our built me up, and restored my health so that, although the doctor said I would not be able to work hard, I have since done the work for 20 people. Hood's Sarsaparilla cured my husband of the boils, and we regard it a wonderful medicine." Mrs. ANNA PETERSON, Latimer, Kansas. Remember

A. D. 1620.

Here is one of our "Delft" reproductions of the present season. You have seen high backed chairs before that were called "Colonial," but it is quite a different matter to possess a FACSIMILE of one of the old Mayflower chairs.

The lines of this chair are unmistakably a sign of its authenticity. They are like the points of a fine horse; they are not easily mistaken when once seen.

The high arms; the recessed, solid seat; the cross braces from the head rest to the base; the swelling Dutch legs—all these are the proof marks of the period.

The finish is in ivory white, with old China blue painted decoration under a stout varnish. One or two of these old Colonial chairs should be in every summer cottage.

THE BUSINESS OUTLOOK.

There is, unquestionably, a better feeling in business circles than has been noticeable for a few months at least. Merchants say there is more inquiry for goods and reports from traveling men on the road indicate a more confident situation. The volume of trade as shown by the week's bank clearings is also increasing to an extent which makes people look forward to the balance of the season with considerable confidence.

In Fall River the over-supply of print cloths continues and one large printing company has closed down until the market and its own stock of cloths will permit resumption. It is believed that the demand for print cloths will start up soon enough to prevent extensive shut-downs.

In the cotton trade the mills are receiving more orders for goods, although perhaps at no better prices. In the woolen trade, however, there is no improvement and many mills continue closed, while others are working on short time.

The most unfavorable factor in the business world is continued slowness of collections. This is true of sections where improvement in other directions is quite marked. In the manufacture of boots and shoes business is good, wholesalers reporting large sales at nearly all points. Iron and steel are almost stagnant, consumers having stocked up previous to the recent advance.

A disquieting feature in the general situation is the large number of important mercantile failures throughout the country. However, Wall Street has ignored the unfavorable factors outside its limits and has chosen to advance prices of securities on the hope of the St. Louis convention declaring for the single gold standard, on cheap rates for money, and on small increases in railroad earnings.

THE second summer, many mothers believe, is the most precarious in a child's life; generally it may be true, but you will find that mothers and physicians familiar with the value of the Gail Borden Eagle Brand Condensed Milk do not so regard it.

WEAK AND SICKLY.—"I was sickly all last winter, and some one advised me to try Hood's Sarsaparilla, and I took four bottles of it. I found it a beneficial and invigorating medicine. We have the highest opinion of Hood's Sarsaparilla." Hon. Chas. H. McElroy, Gibson St., Dorchester, Mass.

WOOD—In Middleboro, April 13, Catharine S., widow of the late Rev. Charles W. Wood, aged 80 years.

REV. ALEXANDER C. CHILDS.

Mr. Childs, who had resided in Worcester for the past five years, died April 13, at the home of his son, in his 73d year. He graduated at Yale in 1845, and at Union Seminary in 1849. His several pastorates were at East Falmouth, Amesbury, Rehoboth, Chatham, West Charleston, Vt., Sharon, Vt., Oxfordville, N. H., South New Market, N. H., West Gloucester and Lindboro, N. H.

"He was a good man, full of the Holy Ghost and of faith." He was a simple, earnest, positive and tender gospel preacher.

While here he united himself with the Central Church. He greatly loved to preach as opportunity offered, but he could honor the pew as well as the pulpit, and was a most loyal and helpful parishioner.

He greatly endeared himself to his brethren in the ministry. "He was faithful in that which is least as well as in much." At the time of his death he was scribe of the Worcester Central Association, and also secretary of the Monday Ministers' Meeting. The funeral services were conducted by Drs. Merriman, Gould and Mix.

HE COLOR LINE" MELTING AWAY.

Y PROF. EUGENE HARRIS, FISK UNIVERSITY.

en years ago it would have been said that white organizations in the South to invite colored people to help them in their be- olent enterprises was unthinkable and im- sible, but the impossible has happened. Mozart Society of Fisk University has en two jubilee concerts for the Baptist Aid iety and the Relief Society of Nashville. the first time in its history sixty students Fisk University have faced for two solid rs more than two thousand Southern white ple and done so at their own request and their own benefit. The concert was at- ded by the élite white people of Nashville. local papers have given generous and appreciative reports of the concert and the best people of the city feel an indebtedness to Fisk University which they heartily acknowledge and express. It is no longer the case that our singers have to go North for an audience, for they have an appreciative hearing at home.

Never before in its history has the relation between the school and the city been so cordial and intimate. The race problem is being solved. The color line is being blotted out. Its obliteration is coming upon the Southerners "like a thief in the night." Our Congregational work, in a quiet and unobtrusive way, is disarming the whites of their prejudices. Without direct or conscious effort the "middle wall of partition," which now separates the races, is visibly crumbling away. The change in public sentiment toward the work of Fisk University is radical and manifest. I do not mean that public sentiment has ever been positively antagonistic, but that there has been a change from indifference to genuine interest and sympathy.

MRS. R. A. LINENDOLL, Mayflower Cottage.

Hyomei is a purely vegetable antiseptic, and destroys the germs which cause disease in the respiratory organs. The air, charged with Hyomei, is inhaled at the mouth, and after permeating the minutest air-cells, is exhaled through the nose. It is aromatic, delightful to inhale, and gives immediate relief.

Pocket Inhaler Outfit, Complete in Sealed Case (see cut), by Mail, $1.00, to any part of the United States; consisting of pocket inhaler, made of deodorized hard rubber (beautifully polished), a botttle of Hyomei, a dropper, and full directions for using. ## GREAT AMERICAN REVIVALS.

At the Boston Ministers' Meeting last Monday, Rev. J. L. Hill, D. D., gave an address on the Greatest American Revivals; Their Differences and Lessons. He first characterized the "great revival" of 1857. At this time over four hundred thousand individuals were converted. The revival was going on simultaneously all over the country. The members of the New York legislature held daily prayer meetings in the room of the Court of Appeals at Albany. In Washington, at the Capitol, a committee was appointed to conduct union Congressional prayer meetings. In Philadelphia alone the conversions numbered 10,000. This movement was remarkable for its spontaneity. Widely distant sections of the country felt that the Spirit of God had come among them and the universal religious awakening followed.

During the revival of 1740, when 50,000 were converted, the doctrine peculiarly prominent was that of the new birth. In 1797, after the Revolutionary war, when men were exultant over what they had accomplished, the preachers emphasized especially the sovereignty of God. In 1830 the antiphonal truth was brought forward and men were taught that they must repent, believe and secure for themselves new hearts. The revival which followed the terrible financial disasters which culminated in October, 1857, differed from previous ones in that it was not brought about by preaching, and was conducted largely by laymen. During the Moody and Sankey meetings, a few years ago, the love of God was dwelt upon and Christ was represented as a seeking Saviour, the favorite songs being The Ninety and Nine, and O, To Be Nothing.

As a result of this survey Dr. Hill believes three positions can safely be taken. First, there is such a thing as sowing to the Spirit. The man who enters the field and works according to spiritual laws has a right to expect results. Second, in the whole matter of revivals no phenomenon is so strange as the fragmentariness of the truth that is used by the Spirit to produce a revolution in spiritual experience. Third, spiritual truth, to be effective, must have a certain atmosphere. He predicts that the next great revival will cluster round the personality and bring into full view the deity of Christ.

THE GOSPEL FOR AN AGE OF DOUBT.

In his fifth lecture in the Lyman Beecher course at Yale, Dr. Henry van Dyke spoke on The Source of Authority in the Kingdom of Heaven, showing that Christ is the seat of authority in doctrine as well as in grace.

The subject of the sixth lecture was Liberty. The three difficult problems of today, said Dr. van Dyke, are the psychological problem of the freedom of the will, the theological problem of the relation of God to the universe, and the moral question of man's duty to man in a world of inequality. Infidelity gives these up in despair. Christ answers them with three truths, clearly and sharply: human liberty, divine sovereignty and universal service.

We find much of fatalism in current literature. Free will is made a myth and man an automaton. Man is irresponsible. Religion has good only in its ethics and in its sedative quality. Man's feet, according to this view, are tangled in a net woven by his apish ancestors. Much of this fatalism is baptized with a Christian name, but it is fatalism just the same. Jesus comes to those who are deepest in the meshes of fate and tells them they are free. He speaks of a repentance and conversion which are not passive and involuntary but which are inward movements. He tells men that the human will alone excludes them from the kingdom. He denies heredity to those who rely on heredity to save them. He teaches that the deepest inheritance of the human race is its inheritance from God, and that man can attain it by prayer, by the Holy Spirit, through Christ himself. C. S. M.

MR. GLADSTONE ON THE BIBLE.

In the forthcoming volume, The People's Bible History, Mr. Gladstone well says that the Christian apologist, Need entertain no fear in probing to the very bottom any and all objections advanced, on whatever grounds, against the divine inspiration of the Bible. He cannot claim a mathematical exactitude for every proposition it contains. This is quite plain from what has been already stated as to matters of fact. Even in the New Testament we find that inspired utterances appear to have been subject, at least in certain cases, to critical and corrective judgment. . . . Elements of uncertainty, in the strict meaning of the words, we have already noticed. But we have also seen, bounding, tempering and overruling them all, the radiancy of the Divine Spirit, which has flooded the Holy Scriptures with a supply of light that our experience, now reaching over several thousand years, has proved to be fully adequate to all the needs of mankind. And this is the rock that may still and ever be justly termed impregnable.

He well says of rationalistic critics that

A very limited acquaintance with the critical literature certainly does not show me, within my own narrow bounds, that the negative school carefully eschews precipitancy and levity, that it never seems to betray a desire for the negative conclusion rather than the affirmative, that it handles what it deems sick and sore places as children would deal with them in an afflicted parent, that reverence is the keynote of its tone.

OSTON CONGREGATION L CLUB.

ere was no lack of variety in the topics ented at the club in its gathering at Hor-tural Hall last Monday evening. Mr. Capen, in his usual clear and straight-ard manner, explained the bill for pro-ional representation now before the Mass-setts legislature, and ballots were dis-ted in order to illustrate the method of g which it involves. The choice of Hon. Reed, as the leading candidate on the blican ticket, called forth vociferous ap-se, plainly indicating the political prefer-s of the club. Mr. Capen also outlined ral plans for a new Congregational House, g emphasis on the idea that the building ld chiefly represent the denomination in nissionary work, rather than be erected btaining a revenue by rentals for busi-purposes.

e principal topic of the evening was the gregational Church Union of Boston and nity, the new organization which has al-y served a useful purpose in strengthen-weak churches and planning for further nsion into the suburbs. Dr. A. K. Stone e in behalf of the Swedish Church, Mr. Lovett for a proposed new church in kline, Dr. C. H. Beale for another in Dor-ter, and Dr. Arthur Little pointed out desirability of pre-empting territory near Blue Hill Boulevard. Other features of union were discussed by Mr. S. C. Dar-Rev. W. R. Campbell, Dr. W. E. Barton J. Howard Field.

lusion was made to the departure of Dr. emiah Boynton from Boston to Detroit in s of sincere regret.

DEFINITIONS.

GOOD LETTER WRITING: The very essence of it lies in the deliberate exclusion of outsiders, and the full surrender of the writer to the spirit of egotism, amiable, free, light-handed, unpretending, harmless, but still egotism.—Hon. John Morley, M. P.

SOCIETY: Society as a pursuit, an end, is a thing without a soul. The home-spirit, from the sharing of which between home and home it grew, has departed out of it. It is dead. It is a corruption. A professional society woman is a parasite upon the world's heart-growth, helping, as a microbe of disease, to eat out its vitality. There is a terrible reaction in the influence of what we make society to be, without its true heart and center. It is to blame for the many confused problems of our time; it is responsible for the frantic turning of the world upside down. Conventionalties, false effort and restriction crowd in upon and choke out our most beautiful and sacred realities. True homes become more and more scarce. Society women abandon them; they make of them mere arrival and departure stations in the rush of a whirling round. Women who cannot or who will not maintain the modern artificial conditions are discouraged and repelled from any home-making at all. They are forced, through the very need of their natures, to outside work and interest for fellowship; and so there is a great deal attempted, from strong desire for the best, that is yet in its turn untrue, one-sided, adding a fresh derangement to our perplexed systems and theories—our transitional social and political economies.—Mrs. A. D. T. Whitney.

BIOGRAPHICAL.

BARON MAURICE DE HIRSCH.

This unique character died suddenly from a stroke of apoplexy, April 21, on his estate at Presburg, Hungary, at the age of sixty-three. His lavish gifts to charitable objects gave him a world-wide reputation, but the most diverse opinions prevail concerning the man himself. By some he was considered almost uncanny, owing to the fact that singular disasters overtook an unusually large number of persons with whom he associated in business and other ways. He was educated in Brussels where, at an early age, he entered a famous banking house and showed a special aptitude for finance. He soon became a valuable adviser to the firm, and increased his wealth by marrying a daughter of one of the partners. By the purchase and skillful manipulation of Turkish railroad bonds and other schemes he built up a colossal fortune, said to equal the Rothschilds. He distributed it freely, however, and many institutions in Egypt, Turkey and Asia Minor bear his name as their benefactor. He was a Jew and last year he offered the Russian Government $10,000,000 for public instruction if no distinction should be made as to the race or religion of the pupils. The offer was declined.

Baron de Hirsch never visited America, but his benefactions in this country now reach the sum of $2,500,000. About six years ago he established a fund bearing his name for the purpose of ameliorating the condition of Russian and Roumanian Jews in the United States. The money is chiefly invested in farm lands in New Jersey and Connecticut, and is used in part for the maintenance of day and evening English schools and mechanical training schools. Besides this the fund money is used for baths and other institutions in the thickly populated districts of New York city.

REV. FREEMAN COTTON LIBBY

Died at Gorham, N. H., April 15, after a severe and at times very painful illness of more than a year's duration, borne with great fortitude and resignation. He was born in Tuftonboro, N. H., April 14, 1858, and began his public ministry with the Methodists, but was ordained pastor at Meredith, June 5, 1891. He resigned last April to accept a call to Bennington, N. H., but was taken ill in March and never preached again. He was positive in his convictions of truth and fearless in their utterance, sympathetic, zealous and thoroughly consecrated to his work. He was enthusiastic in the Christian Endeavor movement, one of the vice-presidents of the State society and a missionary superintendent. His departure in early manhood seems untimely, but he has entered upon the higher and eternal service. He married Flora E. Twitchell of Gorham, who survives him.

REV. EDWIN E. WILLIAMS,

Who was seriously injured by a fall just before Easter, died April 11. He had been pastor of the strong church in Elyria, O., for nearly twenty-four years, and was greatly beloved throughout the entire city even by people not connected with any church. Many of the business houses were closed on the day of the funeral, services being conducted by Rev. James D. Williamson of Cleveland.

NEVER were the crockery shops more attractive at this season of the year both for May wedding presents and the outfits for summer houses. Jones, McDuffee & Stratton's exhibit is a remarkable one.

THE OXYGEN COSTS NOTHING, the price of the instrument being all the expense necessary for years. It can be used by the entire family.

"I sought the aid of a dozen of the best physicians I could find, but they helped me very little. I also tried Compound Oxygen thoroughly, and the Electric battery, but they helped me very little. On Dec. 17, 1891, I commenced using the Electropoise, and continued it about four months. During this time my disabilities were greatly removed. In the course of a year from the time I commenced using it I enjoyed almost perfect health, which has continued to this date. I have great faith in it." REV. J. H. MANSFIELD, Athol, Mass.

PULPIT EXCHANGES.

BY REV. JOHN CUCKSON.

Let me thank you for your brief editorial on Pulpit Exchanges with Unitarians and, at the same time, permit me to express my sincere regret that acts of liberal courtesy between ministers of various religious bodies should ever be misunderstood. At the last meeting of the Boston Association of Ministers, held at my house, Drs. Gordon and Herrick were elected members of the association. Their election meant nothing more than the renewal of friendly relations between Congregational ministers, Unitarian and Trinitarian, in the city of Boston, which had in a measure been disturbed about half a century ago. In the course of conversation several ministers spoke warmly of the social reunion and talked of exchanges of pulpit hospitality. The talk was in the nature of a privileged communication, as all such talk is presumed to be at a private meeting of ministers. But some one, with more conceit than consideration, detailed to a newspaper reporter all that had occurred and more and left the impression on the public mind that what was a mere personal approach, based upon mutual respect and friendship, was something in the nature of a concession to doctrine. Nothing could be further from the truth. Dr. Hale and Dr. Herrick, Dr. Gordon and Dr. Donald, Dr. Munger and myself are not going to influence each other theologically. In matters of religious opinion we differ in many respects and differ widely, but is this difference, which everybody knows who knows us at all, to set us apart altogether, to isolate us as if we had nothing in common, to prevent us or our parishes from being neighborly and setting an example of catholicity in the midst of divergence? As ministers of Christ there is much in common between us and we feel it, and if we come together for any purpose, whether devotional, philanthropic or friendly, the union is moral and spiritual, not theological, and is a protest against dogmatic hatred and jealousy. The truths we represent are not going to suffer because of our Christian courtesy. We do not propose to swerve one hair's breadth from our convictions, but it would seem as if we were willing to yield a good deal to Christian fellowship. A short time ago Dr. Munger came to deliver an address in Boston. My profound respect for his literary and pulpit ability and his character as a Christian minister induced me to invite him to occupy the pulpit of Arlington Street Church. To my great delight he consented to do so. His services were what I expected they would be, a source of great satisfaction to my parish. Were any of the parties to this agreement compromised? Not in the least. A few days afterward came the union service on Good Friday at the Old South. Dr. Gordon, with that breadth and catholicity of Christian sentiment which distinguishes him, invited two Episcopal clergymen, two Congregationalists and a Unitarian to take part in the service. It was, what it has been for years, a memorable service. This simple, unconstrained and brotherly fusion of Christian hearts, despite all doctrinal differences, is one of the most Christlike things in our generation and one could wish it were more general. Sect and denomination are lost for the moment in a common loyalty to the Great Master and his gospel of love. Nothing is gained for Trinitarianism or Unitarianism, but supreme fellowship on the higher plains of reverence and good will becomes an accomplished fact. The jealousies of Christendom spring from mutual ignorance on the part of good men and true, who often do no more than simply misunderstand each other, and any movement which brings them together, unites them in common loyalty and service and helps them to respect each other, alike for their agreements and differences, is a sign of the coming of that kingdom in which there shall be one fold and one shepherd. For my part, the claims of denomination and sect shall never be allowed to hinder the slow coming of the union of Christendom. It may not and probably will not come in the way of any existing denomination, but there are evident signs abroad that God, in his wisdom and goodness, is bringing order out of chaos and symmetry out of confusion, and love will win what logic has lost.

EDMUND K. ALDEN, D. D.

THE enthroned Lord must be distinctly recognized as the One who inaugurated the missionary enterprise, who gave and still gives the imperative command, who accompanied and still accompanies it with the definite promise of his immediate presence and guidance, who provides the spiritual resources necessary for the fulfillment of the command, who superintends and directs every event, every agency, every detail which enters into the prosecution of the work, and who insures final and complete success. This must be the living, continuous thought, supreme over every other, pervading and controlling all plans, or the entire missionary enterprise, including all its instrumentalities and organizations, is a stupendous farce and failure. The wheels may revolve swiftly, wheel within wheel, and that with the "noise of wings like the noise of great waters," but there will be neither living wheels nor living creatures unless the life be that of the personal Lord.—From Dr. Alden's last address to the American Board.

The Mind of the Master.

By the Rev. John Watson (Ian Maclaren). 12mo, cloth, $1 50.

The discussion by this now famous author of such topics in practical religion as "Temptation," "Individuality," "Science of Life," "Loss of Goods," and "Broken Homes," is characterized by the same keen insight and sympathetic touch which have so potently appealed to those who have read his other books.

"It is impossible to analyze a spiritual effect, because it is largely an atmosphere, but the secret of the sweetness of this work is, we think, that it springs from the heart, and not (as is the case with so much of the 'religious' literature of the day) from the intellect."

"These studies are able expositions of truth and there is a subtle charm of expression in them that wins and holds the reader's attention throughout. They should be heartily appreciated by thoughtful seekers after spiritual truth. We are glad to hear from Ian Maclaren in the rôle of a preacher."—The Observer.

HISTORY OF CHRISTIAN DOCTRINE.

By Prof. George P. Fisher, Yale University. Crown 8vo, $2.50 net.

This work is the fruit of many years of study and experience in instruction in this branch of Church History. It comprises not only an account of the rise of dogmas which make up the established creeds, but, also, of the course of theological thought and discussion from the foundation of the Church until the present time. It includes thus a comprehensive survey of modern theology in the Protestant and Roman Catholic bodies, with a clear statement of the influence exerted by the philosophical and scientific researches and theories of recent times.

"It is the classic treatise on its subject."—Prof. G. B. Stevens, Yale University.

NOW OR NEVER

THIS SPECIAL OFFER LIMITED TO JUNE 1ST

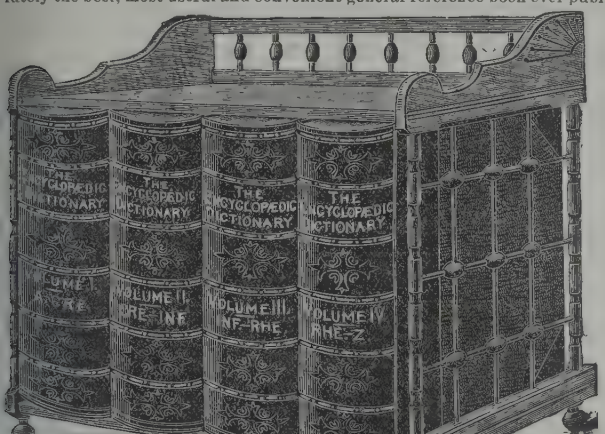
Over Two Hundred Thousand Dollars have been expended in the past twelve months in advertising our great Standard Dictionary and Encyclopædia of the world's knowledge. It is generally admitted that we have employed the most aggressive and effectual methods known to successfully place our work in the very front rank of standard reference libraries. There is scarcely a town, city or hamlet in the whole United States where the fame and popularity of the new and entirely up-to-date is not known. Would-be competitors are jealous of the tremendous and well-merited success of this truly great work. Hundreds and thousands of letters have been received from people in all stations of life, commending the work in the highest possible terms. Schools, Colleges, Libraries, Public Institutions, Professional and Business Men in great numbers pronounce The Encyclopædic Dictionary absolutely the best, most useful and convenient general reference book ever published.



Just as They Look.

100 Editors Employed

In preparation 17 years

$750,000.00

When you consider the avish expenditure of money above shown, you will fully realize why it is necessary to advance the price. For more than a year we have exerted every effort regardless of expense to show the intelligent and appreciative public the real value of this marvelous and masterly concentration of the entire knowledge of the universe into four massive volumes.

The four massive volumes, substantially bound, contain 5,357 pages, 16,000 columns of clear type matter, 3,000 illustrations, 250,000 words, 50,000 important encyclopædic topics. Each volume 9 in. wide, 11½ in. long, 3 in. thick. Weight of set, about 40 lbs.

Until June 1st
After June 1st

the insignificant sum of $1.00 in cash, and the remainder in monthly payments of $1 40 for one year, will secure the work. the price will be advanced to $42 00. Every purchaser under this special offer is expected to speak of the work to his friends and thus help us to advertise it. Understand, no more than 3 sets will be furnished any one person. No one who would speak the English language correctly or become thoroughly posted on all branches of knowledge can afford to neglect this rare opportunity. If you do not already own this great work lose no time in investigating our offer. All orders mailed before midnight of May 31st will be filled. Send your order now and avoid being disappointed.

This work is not for sale at book stores, and can only be obtained from us or our authorized representatives.

It is a Complete Dictionary of the English language Every word is exhaustively treated as to its origin, history, development, etymology, pronunciation and meanings.

It is a Thorough Encyclopædia of anatomy, botany, chemistry, zoölogy, geology, art, music, agriculture, physics, philosophy, mechanics, history, mythology, theology, &c.

It is a Superb Library Book, substantially bound, printed from new plates, in large, clear type, on heavy white paper, and illustrated with thousands of explanatory pictures made especially for this work.

It defines 250,000 words, and treats 50,000 subjects encyclopædically—nearly twice as many separate topics as are covered by the largest of other encyclopædias.

TWO EXPERT OPINIONS—THOUSANDS SIMILAR.

Rev. Charles H. Parkhurst, D. D., LL. D.

NEW YORK, March 9, 1896.

Gentlemen:

The Encyclopædic Dictionary is a library condensed into four volumes; a ton of diffusiveness reduced to forty pounds of quintessence, and, withal, as delicate in detail as it is comprehensive in contents.

Yours very sincerely,
C. H. PARKHURST.

Ex-Postmaster General Bissell.

Gentlemen: BUFFALO, N. Y., March 25, 1896.

I have examined your Encyclopædic Dictionary, and regard it a splendid work. Added to the qualities that make it a good dictionary, is a fund of encyclopædic knowledge unusual in such a book. In my opinion, it will be found of great value to the public generally, and especially to professional men.

Yours very truly, W. S. BISSELL.

Books guaranteed as represented or money refunded if returned within 10 days.

How to Get this Great Work. Send $1.00, and the entire four handsome volumes, bound in cloth, will be forwarded. Every month thereafter send $1.40 for twelve months, making a total payment of $17.80 (regular price of this style, $42.00). If Half-Russia style is desired, the monthly payments are $1.75 until $22.90 is paid (regular price this style, $52.50). If Full-Sheep style is wanted, monthly payments are $2.00 until $25.00 is paid (regular price of this style, $60.00). The first payment in any case is only One Dollar. Any one wishing to pay all cash may deduct 10 per cent.—this allowance is practically cost of keeping the account if purchased on monthly payment plan. We always recommend the Half-Russia binding as the most serviceable. (When ordering, be sure to mention style binding wanted). Understand, the complete set of four volumes is sent after the first payment of $1.00, which gives you the use of them for a year while paying the remainder at the rate of only a few cents a day. All freight or express charges must be paid by purchaser. That you will be entirely satisfied is shown by our willingness to send you a valuable set of books upon payment of only $1.00. We refer to any Bank, any Newspaper, or any Commercial Agency in Philadelphia.

THE official advance statistics of the 1896 Year-Book, published in another column, are, on the whole, gratifying. If we have not built a church a day during the last year we have built more than two a week. If the gain in membership is less than it was the year before, it still remains true that more than 35,000 persons professed Christ and are enrolled as Congregationalists. A gain of 4,600 pupils in our Sunday schools is indicative that work vital to the perpetuity of the church is being done among the young. That the benevolent contributions have decreased nearly $3,000 is not surprising in view of the times, but the average gift per member still remains high compared with the average in other denominations. A decrease of $327,694 in the amount expended in our churches at home has, no doubt, brought hardship to not a few clergymen and other servants of the church, but it is proper that economy should rule at home at a time when retrenchment is necessary abroad.

The Boston Herald, in its editorial last Monday on The Need of a Broader Policy, and Dr. Nehemiah Boynton in his address before the Ministers' Meeting called attention to and emphasized certain facts respecting Congregationalism in old Boston and the greater Boston, which cannot be reiterated too often. The strong city or suburban church must be interested in and contribute toward maintaining city churches once well to do and strong or they will perish. The principle of independence must not be made a fetich. Common sense and ordinary business sagacity are all that are needed, plus a generous spirit, to solve the whole problem. A society, the Congregational Church Union of Boston and Vicinity, through which the churches can act, has recently been organized by men who see the situation and realize how imperative it is that action should begin. The time has not come nor ever will for us to cease aiding or planning for denominational interests, national or international, but the hour certainly has struck for a reformation in local conditions.

The meeting in the South Church, Springfield, last week, attended by eighty-six delegates representing forty-six churches of several denominations, was the first formal gathering of those in Hampden and Hampshire Counties who believe so heartily in church unity that they are willing to co-operate in discussing it, emphasizing the points on which they agree, forgetting for the time the essentials or nonessentials on which they differ. President Seelye of Smith College, who presided, outlined a platform for church unity as broad as that on which the World's Congress of Religions stood, but the other speakers, including Dean George Hodges of the Protestant Episcopal Theological School of Cambridge, Rev. Dr. William H. P. Faunce of the Fifth Avenue Baptist Church, New York city, and Dr. Lyman Abbott who preached the sermon, were more inclined to believe that the churches must come together first on a narrower platform, and that the unity must be one of spirit rather than agreement in ritual and polity. The machinery of this Hampden and Hampshire conference is kept at a minimum. No attempt is made to bind its members by the adoption of resolutions or the formulation of principles, and therein is its merit. It serves by adding to the knowledge and promoting the fellowship of Christian clergymen and by exposing the weakness and wickedness of sectarianism, while as yet nothing has been said or done to lessen the denominational loyalty of those who are members of the conference.

Last week we chronicled a contest between the clergymen of Montreal and Canadian legislators and executive officials. This week it is gratifying to be able to note a similar case nearer home where Christian clergymen have spoken out concerning official negligence and when rebuked for so doing by a representative official have not flinched but reiterated their charges. At a recent mass meeting held in the Tabernacle at Jersey City to protest against the lax enforcement of the Sunday saloon closing law, several of the speakers, including Rev. John L. Scudder, paid their respects in most emphatic terms to the prosecutor of Hudson County. The prosecutor in a letter to the public revealed that he felt the lash, and indulged in sarcastic comment on clergymen who were "intoxicated with the exuberance of their own verbosity." Mr. Scudder, not daunted by this sneer, replied and informed the prosecutor that the outburst of feeling was not a passing storm but "a change in climate caused by increasing patriotism among Christian people"; that the clergymen of the city were not venting any political spite against the prosecutor, but wished him to understand that he was their servant and the public's, whom they "intended to watch with eagle eye." Dr. T. L. Cuyler, last week at the Cooper Union meeting in New York city, paid his respects to Mr. Platt and Governor Morton in language that one of his temperament seldom indulges in publicly, and he, too, has been called to account by that saintly and smooth-spoken organ of Tammany, the New York Sun, which loses no opportunity to hurl venomous epithets at Dr. Parkhurst whenever he ventures to exercise his rights as an American citizen and tries to fulfill his duties as a prophet in scarifying the skin of those whose flesh is corrupt and full of all manner of uncleanness. Some men are fortunate in, and to be honored for, the enemies they win.

In the hurry of the age many treasures seem to go to waste and not the least are those of the meditative, studious, religious life which our fathers knew. We have no time to meditate or study and far too little time to pray. The thought of pressing obligations and unfinished tasks comes between us and our petitions. We feel that we pray selfishly because we are too tired or worried to think of interests which are really dear, but which do not come within the circle of our instant needs. We had meant to remind God of the necessities of friends and our thoughts did not get beyond our own wants and the wants of those for whom it is our business to provide. We intended to plead for the persecuted and afflicted, the poor and the forgetters of their God and, while we were at our hurried petitions, we never thought of them. Part of this hurry is artificial and for it we must hold ourselves to blame, but often it is a necessary part of certain stages of our modern life, and then it is a comfort and delight to know that God does not need to be reminded and that the prayers of our hearts are read by him although they never reach the lips. Then, too, we can appreciate the depth of meaning in the petitions which our Lord taught his disciples. "Thy kingdom come." That includes all the details which we forget. "Forgive us our debts." In that even the debts of our weak petitions are included. Nor is it ever possible for Christ to be far from one whose heart, however weary, rests in faith on him.

THE TWO POSTULATES.

The fearlessness of broad-minded Christians in the presence of a truth-seeking and impartial science found expression in the utterances at the dedication of the new site of Columbia University the other day when reverence and research went hand in hand. "Truth is truth wherever and howsoever it may be found," said one of the speakers, and the same confidence in the future, which is really confidence in God, was the underlying thought of the occasion. Why should it ever be otherwise? Faith and science are not identical, but they are marching side by side.

The thought of modern science begins by postulating law, as the thought of Christianity has always begun by postulating a lawgiver. In each case it is a beginning taken for granted and incapable of full mathematical proof. You cannot prove the existence of God to one who denies it as you can prove that the three angles of a triangle are equal to two right angles, nor can you prove with the same formal demonstration that law is universal. In each case, however, there is presumptive proof raised to so high a degree that doubt becomes an impeachment of the doubter's common sense, while experiment, carried as far as our circumstances allow us to carry it, helps to confirm the result which at the beginning is taken for granted. Thus far, at least, there is no contradiction between science and religion. The assumption of law does not exclude the belief in a lawgiver, and the belief in a lawgiver does not exclude the search after the law by which he governs.

More than this may be said, indeed. To ordinary minds the thought of law requires the thought of God, and the thought of God finds its natural satisfaction in the study of the laws by which he governs. The two assumptions which have come to rule the world of thought belong so much together that if one were lacking it would be suggested by the other. The two realms of thought which have so often been treated as if they were mutually exclusive prove to be supplementary, not contradictory. It is possible, indeed, to make some degree of progress in either while the other is ignored or denied, but lasting progress, founded upon broad views and complete recognition of existing facts, requires an acknowledgment of God as well as government, of the law as well as of the lawgiver.

If we ask ourselves why it is that there has been such a history of misunderstandings between the religious and the scientific leaders we perceive that, however complicated with questions of the slow development of the race and the divine authority which religious thinkers claimed not only for their message but for themselves, the root of the trouble has been that each side has been disposed to deny the fundamental postulate of the other. For centuries science had not attained its method. It reasoned from generals to particulars and made no progress. When it began to do its work in the true way it was as slow to recognize that there is a difference of working method between it and religion as the church was to acknowledge that a line of work had begun in which its authority was to count for nothing. The new science imagined that its instruments of observation, experiment, comparison and generalization were the working factors of a practical omniscience. It confounded knowledge with the last physical report of sense perception and made the spirit in man a product of the matter which was its instrument. Dealing with the material it suffered itself to forget the windows of the soul which open upon the spiritual and bring man face to face with God. As religion had expected to solve all the problems of the world by an authority founded upon revelation, so materialistic science expected to find a solution by the method of the scalpel and the microscope. It subjected man himself to the inquiry, only to find itself baffled by something behind nerve tissue, and to be forced to acknowledge that in the secret recesses of his soul there was a knowledge of which nothing in the nerves of sense could give account.

Briefly, then, religion describes its experiments in the life with God in terms of personal acquaintance, while science describes its conquests in the realm of matter in terms of sense perception. Christ's promise was that God would come and dwell with those who loved him, and thousands in every age have been ready, after years of the experiment of faith, to say, in glad use of the personal and not the material pronoun, "I know whom I have believed." Too often still a near-sighted science treats this experience as a delusion, as too often, when science asserts its right to examine the material things of religion, timid theologians look upon its claims as an intrusion and a peril. The ultimate science will take account of the results of faith and the ultimate Christianity will gladly submit its record and its machinery to the closest scrutiny of science.

If it be asked where, in this harmony of faith and science, belief in miracles is to appear the answer has been already suggested. As the ultimate science will not be atheistic it cannot be materialistic. Acknowledging the higher force of a living will, it must agree that, if our human choices and volitions can influence the material world, much more must the choices and volitions of the lawgiver express themselves in the material world according to the needs which he discerns. With a juster sense of the limitations of its knowledge and a wider view of the relationships of spirit, science will discover that law is not an arrangement of skillful clockwork, which cannot be interrupted without stopping altogether, but the free and constant expression of a living will. As the spirit of man works in the sphere of man, so in the sphere of man, as well as in the material world, the spirit of God works and brings his purposes to perfection.

SUNDAY BICYCLE RIDING.

Comments that we have heard and communications that have come to us since Mr. Hamlin's article, Bicycles and Electric Cars versus Sunday, was printed assure us that it is a very live subject, and the daily newspapers tell us of not a few clergymen who are realizing the fact and are trying to adjust the services of the church to the new conditions. For instance, there is a church near Coney Island, N. Y., to which resort thousands of wheelmen ride each Sunday, that recently met and discussed the situation. A committee of men and women was appointed to welcome all wheelmen, the basement was measured and it was found that 300 wheels could easily be stored there during church services, and a check system was devised by which the bicyclist could be guaranteed the safety of his machine while he was worshiping, and the pastor and people are now ready to welcome bicyclists who care to worship.

Rev. Dr. David Gregg of Brooklyn, formerly of the Park Street Church, Boston, in an interview with a Brooklyn Eagle reporter last week, repeated what he had substantially said before in a sermon, viz.: that there was "a time for bicycle exercise on Sunday, but that time was not from 10.30 to 12 o'clock in the morning. That just as a man who wishes to take a walk in the fresh air on the Sabbath has a perfect right to do so, providing he fulfills his covenant vows, so he has a right to ride his bicycle. If people wish to ride to church on their bicycles I will make arrangements to have a room in the church for keeping them while their owners are engaged in worship. This question of bicycling is going to be discussed all over the country. It is one of the great questions of the day and the church is not unreasonable in regard to the matter."

But what of those who have made no covenant vows, who cannot be appealed to with this argument—the thousands to whom Sunday is the only day for wheeling and who are disposed to ignore worship and spiritual culture in search for physical health or pleasure? It is useless to deny that during those seasons of the year when bicycling is possible, and on those Sundays when a wheel may be used, the worship of the church has to face a rival more dangerous than the Sunday newspaper. The French have a saying, "The good is the enemy of the best," and there are not a few, in and out of the church, who will ride bicycles on Sunday at such times and in such ways as to show that they fail to recognize the truth of this adage.

EDMUND KIMBALL ALDEN.

The death of Dr. Alden removes one who has been long conspicuous in our denomination. A direct descendant of the Pilgrims, he cherished with passionate ardor the institutions they planted and defended them with Puritan sturdiness and loyalty to his conscience. He was born a Congregationalist, and would have been out of his element in any other form of church government. It came naturally to him to take an active interest in our denominational affairs. While he was still a young man he made his presence felt in local and general meetings of Congregationalists and in the administration of our missionary societies. A man of strong convictions and tender, emotional nature, he was beloved by many who trusted him as their pastor and spiritual guide. He lived near to God and brought many into that blessed fellowship.

But his most notable public service was as home secretary of the American Board. He was already, as a member of the Prudential Committee, thoroughly acquainted with the work when he entered on that office twenty years ago. With ability and devotion fully equal to those of his illustrious predecessors he fulfilled its duties, holding before the churches a lofty ideal of foreign missions and inspiring the missionaries sent out under his care to the best service of which they were capable. His views of Christian doctrines were decided and fixed, and when he differed from others united with him in the administration of the Board, he vigorously endeavored to limit appointment for missionary service to those who accepted the beliefs he held. As the conflict waxed warmer he stood immovable, refusing to believe that he was not supported by the majority of the churches and of the missionaries of the Board, till the action of the annual meeting in 1893 made it evident beyond question that his policy of exclusion would not longer be sustained. Then he promptly and honorably declined re election and retired to private life.

In any calling Dr. Alden might have chosen he would have distinguished himself. He had the ability and discernment of a statesman and the courage and devotion of a saint. He was a delightful companion, and he loved to be, as he well knew how to be, a leading spirit with those who held his views. No doubt his sudden death was a welcome exit from this world into the everlasting fellowship to which he had long looked forward with eager anticipation.

THE VETO.

The bill regarding the First Congregational Society in Lowell, upon which we commented last week as having passed both branches of the legislature, has since been vetoed by Governor Wolcott. A portion of the message we print in another column.

We congratulate the churches and societies of the State upon this act of a sagacious and resolute executive. They have escaped the establishment of a precedent by which the legislature may interfere by force in the local affairs of any one of our churches, annul by special legislation the rights of any particular religious society singled out for that purpose—rights guaranteed by the statutes of making its own by-laws and prescribing its own conditious of membership, and jeopardizing the security of property held by any religious society. This meddlesome and vicious legislation is not to take effect. The decision was made after the governor had given both sides a fair hearing, in which a strong remonstrance was presented whose long list of signatures included the names of scores of pastors in this vicinity of every shade of opinion.

Our readers, of course, understand that we have taken no side in the Lowell controversy. Whether either side has been wise or unwise in its methods or its spirit was out of our province. But we have felt that the legislature of Massachusetts has no right to interfere in a local church quarrel for one side or another. We hope that such an attempt may never be repeated.

Is it too early to suggest the hope that the church in Lowell, by consent of all parties, will now, according to our Congregational method, seek for the sympathetic advice of the neighboring churches through a council mutually agreed upon? We believe that such advice, calm and tender, would be of the greatest service.

OUR PILGRIMAGE.

The membership of the party of pilgrims which is to set forth for England and Holland under our auspices, June 4, has reached the limit originally set, but since we took the precaution to secure five or six extra berths on The Columbia it is still possible for a few persons to join the party, which now is delightful in its personnel, with about an equal number of ladies and gentlemen, who come from twelve States, East and West, some of the men representing the clerical, medical, editorial and military professions, while others are well-known business men, some of them of national reputation.

Each mail from our representative in England brings news of increasing interest in the party, indicated by the many and varied comments of the secular press and by the preparations that are being made on all sides to make the pilgrims welcome, and to provide them with exceptional opportunities for pleasure and education. In addition to the many "functions" which we have hitherto announced, it is now possible to state that the London Missionary Society is anxious to entertain the party at the Mission House, and a similar reception is planned at the headquarters of the great London Bible Society. A special musical service has been arranged in Union Chapel, and those who have heard the Hallelujah Chorus of Handel sung by the immense congregation of what is still affectionately known as "Dr. Allon's church" will understand what a privilege this will be. The officials of Memorial Hall will tender a reception, and the Pilgrims, if they improve their opportunity, will discover the advantage of possessing a noble denominational building, and will, we trust, be inspired to further, when they return, the plans now maturing for a new headquarters in Boston worthy of our denomination.

THE JUBILEE AT PRINCETON.

On Tuesday of this week was celebrated the jubilee of Dr. William Henry Green as instructor in Princeton Theological Seminary. Occasions of this kind are rare and of wide interest, not many professors remaining in the full exercise of their calling after fifty years of work.

Dr. Green was graduated from Lafayette and remained as tutor at an age when most boys are entering college. After a year's study at Princeton Seminary the future professor of Oriental literature was recalled to Lafayette to teach mathematics. He soon returned to the seminary and, upon graduation, was appointed instructor of Hebrew, his continued activity in that capacity being broken only by two years' service as pastor of a church in Philadelphia, from which he was called back to the seminary by election to the chair of Old Testament and Oriental literature. He was chosen president of Princeton College in 1868, but declined the call, and Dr. McCosh was thereupon elected.

Dr. Green has been moderator of the General Assembly and was chairman of the American committee of Old Testament revision. He is widely known through personal activities and the love of a multitude of students scattered all over the world, as well as by his numerous publications. He may fairly be called the leader today of the conservative or traditional school of Hebrew study and Old Testament criticism both in this country and abroad, his books containing the ablest recent presentation of that side of the question. How wide a space this activity of fifty years in the field of Old Testament criticism covers may be gathered from a list of publications which begins with a defense of the Pentateuch against Colenso and ends with an analysis of the conclusions of Wellhausen, Driver and Briggs.

The program of the jubilee celebration was an interesting and varied one, including addresses congratulatory and historical from representatives of other seminaries and colleges, and a great gathering of friends and former pupils. We have not always found ourselves in agreement with Dr. Green's theological or critical opinions, but we recognize the value of such a life of Christian service as he has given the world and join heartily in the congratulations and good wishes of his friends.

MANIFESTING THE HOLY SPIRIT.

In their zeal to honor Christ Christians often seem to forget that he has chosen to help them in these later days through the agency of the Holy Spirit. Many seldom allude to the Spirit and seem to quite overlook his relation to their spiritual welfare. This is due to carelessness rather than to any disposition to belittle the importance of his help, but it is desirable for us all to think more about him.

We may secure his presence and aid in two ways—by asking for it and by striving to render our hearts fit for his indwelling. We must invite him to come to us. He does not force himself upon us. He often comes to us unbidden and seeks our welcome, and for the love he bears us is willing to put up with a scanty and even grudging hospitality that he may do us good. But he will not long abide unless we freely welcome him and ask him to remain, realizing in some degree what a blessing his presence is. And we must do our best to make ourselves fit for his companionship. He can have no fellowship with evil, and if he sees that we are making it as cordially welcome as we make him, he will depart. He remains only when he perceives that we are co operating with him in expelling it, and in seeking to cleanse and purify our hearts that they may be such as God can approve and bless.

When we thus yield to him and welcome him he fortifies us inwardly against sin, strengthens and quickens our powers of goodness, enlightens our judgment, inspires us to more fruitful righteousness of life, and thus fits us for heaven by teaching us how to make heaven upon earth. There is no mistaking the Christian who is full of the Holy Spirit. The influence of the Spirit radiates from him perceptibly and beneficently. His life is serene, devout and noble and men see something of God in him and thankfully take new courage themselves.

CURRENT HISTORY.

Domestic Politics.

Unless that which cannot now be foreseen or predicted happens it seems probable that Mr. McKinley of Ohio will be nominated, possibly by acclamation, at the National Republican Convention in St. Louis next month. Vermont's desertion of Mr. Reed and its refusal to indorse him, and the convention's expression of preference for Mr. McKinley, was a blow to the anti-McKinley forces most depressing in its effect and responsible largely for the overthrow of the "machine" in Illinois the following day, and the unequivocal indorsement of Mr. McKinley given by the Republicans of that State. He now has within seventy odd votes of a number sufficient to nominate him on the first ballot, and the force of the principle that "nothing succeeds like success" is reckoned upon by his friends as being strong enough to swing States that have yet to hold their conventions into line for the man from Ohio, whose identification with a protective tariff law is responsible for the ground swell of clamor for him, rather than any reasoned convicton which people have that he has executive ability or can lead his party with honor or guide the nation to a position of national prosperity.

The difference of opinion between Senators Wolcott and Teller of Colorado as to the course Colorado Republicans should pursue, if the St. Louis convention formulates an anti-silver plank in its platform, indicates that the declarations of so many recent State conventions in favor of the gold standard have not been without influence on Senator Wolcott and others, who decline to make hostility to gold the test of fealty to party, and prefer anything rather than a return of the Populist régime in Colorado. This division of sentiment among the silver men will make all the easier the formulation of an unequivocal gold platform, be the candidate Mr. McKinley or not.

Michigan and Pennsylvania Democrats are ranged on the side of the gold standard, and the Keystone State puts forth ex-Gov. Robert E. Pattison as its candidate for the Democratic nomination, a man much superior to Mr. Quay in character.

The Assassination of the Shah of Persia.

Nasr-ed-Dine, shah of Persia, was shot by a religious fanatic, May 1, while entering a shrine near the city of Teheran. He was, considering his ancestry and environment, a decent ruler, better informed than most Asiatic monarchs respecting European politics and tolerant in his treatment of American missionaries. Only recently he received word that Moslem fanatics, inspired by the news from Armenia, were planning to murder the missionaries in Urmia and then loot the mission property. The shah sent word to the chief citizens of the city that if anything of the kind happened he would order the city, or its Moslem section, bombarded and razed to the ground. Whether such tolerance of Christians and defense of their rights is the reason why a Moslem fanatic felt it necessary to end his life we do not know, but it seems more reasonable than any of the reasons set forth in the meager accounts that as yet have come from Persia. His death will render more acute the rivalry between Russia and Great Britain for dominance in Persian affairs, and may lead to international complications, especially if internecine warfare should begin as a result of the rivalry of the two of his many sons most eligible as his successor. Muzzafa-ed-Dine, the second son, has been proclaimed shah.

Can the Armenians Emigrate?

A document has come to us which is circulating among the Armenians in Turkey. It contains such sentences as these: "We have long since abandoned all hope of any political rights or standing in this land, the only position possible for us is that of serfs. We have cherished the hope of effective aid from Christian nations, it has failed us and we are sacrificed to political and selfish ambition. What, then, are we to do?" Three courses are then considered, profession of Islam, continuance in living in ignoble servitude, or emigration to lands where liberty loving people abide. Emigration is favored, but not without a heart wrench. "The graves of our fathers and the mountains and skies of our native land are dear to us; but, alas, so marred with the violence of the oppressor and so darkened by the blood and tears of our bondage that the very sight of it is agony to us." But with the decision to emigrate immediately arise two portentous questions: "Will the sultan permit emigration, and will Christian nations grant an asylum." It is to be feared that just now the sultan is more eager to see American missionaries expelled than he is to hasten or permit the exodus of the people that have proved his thriftiest and most enterprising subjects. But it is not necessary for him to grant permission in a formal way before Christian peoples can proceed to answer partially, if not wholly, the second question which Armenians are now asking. They are a poor people, but they are not beggars. They say that, "On a fair field we feel the proud consciousness of being fully able to provide for our necessities; but now, in the special crisis of so great a change of location and condition, we should need sympathy, encouragement, friendly advice and aid. We believe we should soon be able to return with ample interest all the aid we should now need to accept." Canadian sympathizers with suffering Armenia long since expressed the hope that many of them might be induced to settle in Canada. Cannot something practical along this line be done in the United States? From the patriarch down to the humblest Armenian prayers arise that light may dawn on this phase of a most complicated and disheartening situation.

The latest letters from Armenia tell of the awful disparity between the relief work to be done and funds with which to do it; and the recent massacre at Kilis is ominous of new horrors. The only good news is the assurance that Great Britain and the United States are standing resolutely shoulder to shoulder in defense of the Board's missionaries. That the people of this country demand such action by our Government is indicated by the declarations of the bishops of the Methodist Episcopal Church, who say in their episcopal address:

> No follower of him who is the Redeemer of all mankind can limit his view to any one country. We see in Armenia such atrocities as we never deemed possible of execution in this age. We are no more appalled at the ravage, rapine and murder of a hundred thousand by the Turks than at the apathy and inaction of the so-called civilized nations. Through our whole history and national polity we have held aloof from European and Asian complications. But we believe that the whole diplomatic and moral power of our Government should be put forth to bring these gigantic wrongs to a sudden end.

The Slow-grinding Mills.

Prince Bismarck once said that President Kruger of the Transvaal Republic was the most skillful diplomatist with whom he had ever matched his own great powers, and there are more people in Great Britain today who appreciate President Kruger's ability than there are those who admire Lord Salisbury or Mr. Chamberlain. Since last December President Kruger and the Transvaal authorities have had in their possession indisputable proof that Dr. Jameson's raid, ostensibly for the relief of women and children in Johannesburg and to co-operate with the Uitlanders in forcing reforms in the local government, was the overt act and culmination of a conspiracy hatched by Sir Cecil Rhodes and other officials of the British South African Company—a conspiracy which had for its motive none other than the overthrow of the Transvaal Government and the raising of the British flag at Pretoria. President Kruger has patiently awaited the precise moment when the production of this evidence would tell most in circumventing Mr. Chamberlain's evident intention to disregard treaty obligations and force the Transvaal to grant internal reforms. Not until five of the leaders in the Johannesburg uprising, including Sir Cecil Rhodes's brother and Mr. Hammond, an American mining engineer, had been found guilty of treason, sentenced to death and their sentences magnanimously commuted, did President Kruger furnish to the world copies of the dispatches in cipher which passed last fall between Sir Cecil Rhodes, Dr. Jameson and other of the conspirators. The magnanimity, patience and wisdom shown by the Dutch, together with the revulsion in British public feeling caused by the production of the incriminating correspondence, have made it impossible for Mr. Chamberlain to proceed further; and now a cry goes up from the British public, through their representatives in Parliament and representative journals, for the speedy arrest of Sir Cecil Rhodes and all others in high places, the canceling of the charter of the British South Africa Company, and the recognition, frank though tardy, of the fact that Great Britain will do well to keep her eyes, as well as her hands, off the Transvaal and confine her authority to territory which is hers beyond peradventure. Moreover, it is doubtful now whether she can press her claim to control the foreign policy of the Transvaal.

NOTES.

The new Meline ministry in France will be short lived, as it is an aggregation of individuals rather than a group of men all holding to a definite principle.

The most inspiring rumor of the week is one from Russia suggesting that the czar intends to hallow and make his coronation truly royal by proclaiming liberty of conscience.

The National Armenian Relief Committee has arranged with Rev. B. Fay Mills to hold a series of meetings in the larger cities of the country in the interest of the relief cause, beginning about the middle of this month.

Prof. F. H. Geffcken, the eminent German jurist who died last week, was charged with treason by Bismarck for publishing matter pertaining to the life of Emperor Frederick, and suffered undeserved imprisonment for a time.

Hungary began last week the celebration of the completion of 1,000 years of national life. Its history is full of romance and noble endeavor, and today, although not a nation, Hungary is the dominant state in an empire reckoned as one of the great powers of the earth.

However threatening other aspects of life may be, it is gratifying to note that May day, both in Europe and this country, was exceptionally free from those conflicts between organized labor and employers and between radicals and public officials which in years past have made May 1 a day of terror.

New Hampshire possesses by far the finest natural park and playground of New England in the White Mountain region. Its forestry commission has just announced that the initial steps of forest preservation are to be taken under the law which allows land to be preserved "whenever any person or persons shall supply the necessary funds therefor, so that no cost or expense shall accrue to the State." The amount spent by strangers in New Hampshire every summer runs up to millions of dollars, and the entertainment of tourists is one of the largest and most constant industries of the State. It is well that a beginning has been made, though with less than $2,000 contributed by individuals, but the shortsighted parsimony of the State itself is regrettable, and all the more by contrast with the liberal and far-seeing policy of New York in its handling of the Niagara reservation.

IN BRIEF.

President Eliot of Harvard in a few words describes New York city justly: "At once magnificent and squalid, majestic and ignoble; at once freedom's pride and freedom's reproach."

The old headquarters of the militant atheists of London became a Salvation Army barrack last week. Bradlaugh, were he alive, would be out of a job, and Ingersoll is the only "professional infidel" left, and he seems to be less militant than of yore.

The course of events, foreign and domestic, since Dec. 17, 1895, make very pertinent the story told of Bishop Butler, who, when asked what he was thinking about as he walked about his garden, said to one who had noted his serious mood, "I was reflecting whether it is possible for nations like individuals to go mad."

The British Weekly hears from America that Rev. John Watson (Ian Maclaren) is mentioned as Dr. Stimson's successor at the Broadway Tabernacle. Mr. Watson would receive the heartiest kind of a welcome in our fold. Dr. William M. Taylor was a Scotchman and also a Presbyterian pastor in Liverpool when he was called to the Tabernacle.

The appointment of Rev. John A. Zahm of Notre Dame University to a post very near the pope is an acknowledgment of his scholarship and executive ability, and indicates that Leo XIII. is giving full recognition to those Catholics who go as far as is permissible in acknowledging the modifying influence of modern scientific investigations upon dogma.

The London Missionary Society has our heartiest congratulations upon its success in raising its centenary fund of £100,000 over and above the ordinary income. The year of extraordinary prosperity which Great Britain has enjoyed has no doubt rendered the task easier, but every such special effort stands for a multitude of self-denials. It means freedom from debt for the honored society and opportunity of grasping some new opportunities of work.

The differences of opinion between the Presbyterian Board of Home Missions and two of the Western synods, to which we referred in our recent forecast of the work of the approaching General Assembly, have been settled by private conference between representatives of the parties involving the practical withdrawal of opposition to the plans of the synods. This at once removes a contentious question from the Assembly's docket and illustrates the possibilities of the Christian method of settling disagreements.

The Sacred Heart Review asks us two questions which we take pleasure in answering seriatim. Perhaps the easiest way to inform itself about St. Francis of Sales would be to read Dr. Leonard Woolsey Bacon's recent essay on the subject in his Irenics and Polemics which refers to the authorities. The word Congregationalist in Massachusetts legally covers both Unitarian and Trinitarian churches. If the Sacred Heart Review means to ask whether a Trinitarian Congregationalist may be a Unitarian, surely the question answers itself!

Who can read the solid arguments advanced for and against the creation of a permanent Anglo-American arbitration tribunal by the Yale-Harvard debaters and fail to realize how infinitely superior such intercollegiate contests are to the scenes formerly witnessed each fall at Hampden Park, Springfield. Harvard suffered her first defeat, and the opponents of such a tribunal won. Those who are inclined to sneer at the intellectual possibilities of the black races may take note of the fact that one of the three Harvard speakers was a Negro.

Canon Mason, an English clergyman, who is lecturing in this country now, must have a strange scale of mental proportion. In speaking of all the Reformed Churches (except his own) he said: "Considered as bodies, they form no part of the Church of Christ, but occupy a position of rivalry and antagonism towards it. They are Christian sects, but their Christianity is accidental." The fun of it all is that to the Greek and Latin Churches the Christianity of Canon Mason is accidental. When we are ready to accept an exclusive Christianity founded upon self-assertion we want a self-assertion that is undisputed.

The Watchman, commenting on the seventy-fifth anniversary of The Christian Register, suggests that in 1899, when Zion's Herald celebrates its seventy-fifth anniversary, it would be well if The Congregationalist, The Watchman, The Christian Register and Zion's Herald, "which have represented the religious forces of New England for seventy-five years, should hold a public banquet celebrating religion in New England." This is a suggestion well worth considering. Jog the memories of your contemporaries in 1899, Watchman, and see if they do not respond favorably.

All who have had experience in soliciting money for benevolent work realize the difficulty of getting the last few hundred dollars. Mrs. H. S. Caswell has now reached this critical stage in her noble effort to secure $50,000 from American women before the annual meeting of the Home Missionary Society in June. She undertook to obtain 500 shares in the General Howard Roll of Honor and has nearly succeeded, only forty-eight now being left. Will not the Christian women of the denomination exert themselves still more strenuously in order that the $45,200 already in hand may be rounded out to the desired $50,000?

Dr. Charles S. Robinson of New York is evidently a High Churchman as well as a successful compiler of hymn-books. "I don't belong to any church that is governed from the bottom up," he said, according to reports of a recent debate in the New York Presbytery. But that is the way the Presbyterian Church is governed. The people make the elders and the elders and ministers make the presbyteries and the presbyteries make synods and General Assembly. Dr. Robinson has put himself on the wrong side of the fight that is on between democracy and centralization in the denomination. If he wants a church that is governed from the top down let him go to Rome.

Mr. Herbert D. Ward, who contributes his reminiscences of Dr. Holmes this week, asserted, in an interesting interview recently published in which he set forth his theory of short story writing, as might be expected, from one of his training and environment, a firm belief that the short story should be employed to set forth a moral lesson as well as to please the reader. His experience has shown that at least "three-quarters of humanity—that is to say all those people who are neither utterly depraved nor hopelessly flippant—employ three-quarters of their time and strength in the effort after nobility of character," and he asks, "Is a man who attempts to reproduce life justified in leaving out entirely so important a phase of it?"

Dr. Grenfell's letter in the Conversation Corner of this week has suggestion for thought besides its interest as a mere report from the "Deep Sea Mission." In these days of intense devotion to practical work in the world that now is, it is refreshing to see how it may be combined with a simple, uneffected, hearty faith in the world which is to come. Dr. Grenfell is a devout layman in the Church of England, but with him forms and ritual are lost in the realities of Christian faith and service. We venture to quote from a private letter, not of course intended for publication:

> How much we need God's overshadowing love and a knowledge of his infinite grace when we reflect how unworthy we are to be the King's children and workers! I know when I think of the conflict with self, the world and the devil I feel very unlike the Father, whom we claim. But go on, pray and work to the end, good friend, and meet me gloriously in heavenly places.

Professor Romanes was one of the most distinguished expounders of Darwinism. At first a materialist, he became before his death a believer in Christ and Christianity, and his conclusions on the subject were published under the editorial care of Canon Gore. This conversion seems to have awakened the bigotry of certain American scientists who are at the same time unbelievers in Christ, and they have been asserting that Professor Romanes had softening of the brain in his later years. As they do not question the ability with which he handled the interpretation of nature even in his latest (unfinished) work the accusation looks like the work of defeated spite, nor does the credibility of religion or the authority of Christ rest upon the testimony of any individual, but Canon Gore brings indisputable testimony to the unimpaired intellectual energy of Professor Romanes just before his death, so that the report is likely to prove something of a boomerang.

STAFF CORRESPONDENCE.

FROM BOSTON.

The New Congregational House.

While no definite plans as to location or style of building are yet decided upon two things seem to be reasonably assured: one, to abandon the present site in favor of another somewhere in the vicinity, but not at the corner of Mt. Vernon and Hancock Streets as has been reported, and the other to erect an edifice which shall be devoted exclusively to denominational rather than to business interests. The fixity of certain prominent buildings like the Union Station and the Court House for a generation to come justifies the wisdom of the Congregational Association in determining not to remove to Copley Square.

Dedication of Tremont Temple.

The Baptists are holding high carnival this week in a serious of dedicatory services. The Lord's Supper was celebrated last Friday evening by more than a thousand communicants. The public exercises opened on Sunday and it was an impressive moment when the magnificent organ, the gift of Hon. E. S. Converse, sounded forth the notes of the doxology and the great congregation of 2,500 persons, supported by a choir of nearly 400, stood and added their voices to the volume of praise. The main external features of the old historic building, the third on the present site, are preserved in outline but are glorified by decorations of exceeding beauty and by a façade which is an architectural ornament to the city. In the interior the richly paneled ceiling from which depend clusters of golden threads of irregular lengths, terminating in electric lights, the bronze balconies inwrought with symbols of Christian faith, the superb organ case with decorations of gold and white and delicate green, the figures of heroic size in the stained glass windows, the names of Baptist heroes engraven on the walls—these are some of the features which first attract the eye. The dedicatory prayer by Dr. J. N. Murdock and the sermon by Dr. G. C. Lorimer from Ezra 6: 16 were both befitting the occasion. A strenuous effort is being made to reduce the indebtedness of $250,000, the new building with all its appointments having cost $510,000, and a part of the morning service was devoted to the solicitation of funds.

The first temple was erected as a challenge to human freedom because some one had objected to the presence of a Negro in his pew on Sunday. From that time onward it has been a center from which has radiated an influence for good scarcely paralleled in our national history. From no other platform have echoed such ringing words in favor of reforms of every character, and the presence of Acting Governor Wolcott, Mayor Quincy, Mrs. Livermore and others at the grand banquet on Monday night testified to the fact that the reopening of the temple is an event of more than denominational interest.

Something New in Sociology.

A significant advance along the lines of preventive work in the city is the opening of a Kindergarten Settlement in the heart of the foreign population at the West End. Except, possibly, the Gertrude House in Chicago, it is the only settlement of the kind in the country and is fittingly named in honor of Elizabeth Peabody, who was the first to introduce Froebel's methods into America. An old-fashioned house at 156 Chambers Street, in which an ancient brick oven still remains, has been thoroughly renovated and fitted with the best appliances for carrying on kindergarten work. The schoolroom, furnished by Lucy Wheelock's normal pupils, has accommodations for thirty children between the ages of three and five, but twice that number are already clamoring loudly for admission. A fine piano, the gift of Mrs. Quincy Shaw, choice photographs of the Madonnas, pastoral scenes and pictures of animals, growing plants and singing birds are some of the objective means of education for the neglected little waifs of the neighborhood.

Daily teaching will be supplemented with visits to their homes and with such other forms of service as spring naturally out of neighborhood relations. The head resident, Martha R. Spalding, is a person of finest culture, and her four associates in the house represent the same type of ladyhood, a point of supreme importance in molding childish character. This noisy section of the city, with narrow streets teeming with undisciplined foreigners, is no paradise in which to spend the summer, but the residents will stand bravely at their post through summer's heat and winter's cold. Such sacrifice of personal ease on their part is an eloquent appeal for adequate gifts of money which, at present, are not at all in proportion to the needs of the work. But these cultivated Christian women are alive to the value of preventive measures and believe that in Boston, as in San Francisco, the kindergartens are the best means of checking juvenile criminality. In the latter city, during the last ten years, only two children from the 120 kindergartens have found their way into houses of correction.

Women and Their Activities.

It is asserted that Boston women pay taxes upon $125,000,000 worth of property. It is to be expected, therefore, that the Woman's Club House Corporation, which has received its charter and is ready to sell stock, select a site and erect a building, will put up an edifice that will be an ornament to the city and adapted to the varied interests represented in their club life. The New England Press Association, another influential organization, under the leadership of Mrs. May Alden Ward, is giving special prominence to educational matters. Two notable receptions were held lately, one in honor of Harriet Prescott Spofford, the other for the presidents of the four women's colleges in the State, Radcliffe, Wellesley, Smith and Mt. Holyoke, at each of which eminent educators were present. The working girls, who are not a whit behind their more highly educated sisters in co-operative schemes, recently held a grand rally in Parker Memorial, at which addresses were made by Father Conaty of Worcester and Rev. E. A. Horton, who paid this class of wage-earners the high compliment of being "queens of the kingdom of character." Delegates were present from clubs all over the State. The early closing of the large stores in Boston has been accomplished largely through the influence of the Massachusetts Association of Working Girls' Clubs, of which Edith M. Howes is the efficient president.

Miss Rose Kingsley, who is the guest of Mrs. James T. Fields, is winning golden opinions on account of her lectures on art and literature. She has her father's gift for graceful expression and all the thoroughness which is a distinguishing mark of Englishwomen's work. ☞

FROM NEW YORK.

Broadway Tabernacle Council.

On the afternoon of April 28 the council called by the Broadway Tabernacle Church and Dr. Stimson to advise as to the pastor's resignation met in the church. All the Congregational churches in New York and Brooklyn, with the First in Montclair and Jersey City, N. J., were invited, and a large majority of them were represented by pastor and delegate. These with attending members of the Tabernacle and other churches well filled the house. Dr. Meredith was chosen moderator, and, having to leave before the close of the session, yielded the chair to Dr. Behrends. Dr. Washington Choate was chosen scribe. After hearing the documents presented by church and society, the council, being by itself, through a committee of which Dr. R. S. Storrs was chairman, presented a "result," regretfully recognizing the closing of the pastorate on May 1 and in the warmest terms commending Dr. Stimson as "an able, honored and successful pastor and preacher, noble in spirit, sound in the faith, catholic in sympathy while faithful to his special communion, devoted to its spiritual work and full of rich enthusiasm for it." The result will be found in another column of this issue, and, coming from such a source, may well satisfy the best friends of the retiring pastor.

The Congregational Clubs.

The April meeting of the Congregational Club—after a resolution condemning Mr. Knapp's expulsion from Bitlis, and a tribute of respect and affection to the memory of the late Austin Abbott, offered by J. H. Washburn, Esq.,—gave the evening to Commander and Mrs. Ballington Booth. After some words in defense of the name of the new body, the commander spoke of the spirit and the aims of the Volunteers, before whose minds were to be constantly kept the three words, God, our country and our work. Its measures would be Christian and American, recognizing such rules and methods as are calculated to win the American people. While it was yet too early to speak definitely of plans, they would try to reach the criminal classes, not only the 80,000 now in jails, but some of the 160,000 still at large; with these the many who have fallen in an evil hour, the skeptical, atheistical class, soldiers and sailors, the wage-earners, and not to neglect those in the gutters and sewers.

Mrs. Booth followed in her usual earnest, pathetic, fervent strain, setting forth the new work to be carried on in the old spirit, with many of the same methods that God has so far blessed to the salvation of all, even the most depraved. She was not for trying to make it more "respectable," but disreputable, if need be, if only it were the means of saving souls. Dr. Stimson added words of sympathy with the new movement and those having it in charge.

Brooklyn's Congregational Club was entertained for more than an hour with an address from Dr. A. J. Lyman on How America Looks from Norway. The address was enriched with brilliant descriptions of Norway scenery, manners and customs of its people, and recitations of their pathetic folk-songs, which lost nothing of their quaint pathos and beauty in the skillful handling of Dr. Lyman, of whom it may be said truly, "he touches nothing that he does not adorn."

In making its nominations for next year's board of officers the Brooklynites departed from the unwritten law of the clubs, that their presiding officers shall be laymen, by nominating Dr. Joseph B. Clark for president. If elected, his administration will vindicate the wisdom of the change for once at least. HUNTINGTON.

FROM THE INTERIOR.

Ministers' Meeting.

Responding to a hearty invitation from Professor Taylor the ministers last Monday were the guests of the Chicago Commons and met in the building it occupies in a river district on the West Side. The attendance was encouraging, though hardly as large as usual. This ministerial gathering was the introductory session of the School of Economics which, under the auspices of the Commons, continued through the week. The general topic for consideration during the week was The Relation of the School to the Church. There were two papers Monday morning, one by Rev. J. B. Silcox of Leavitt Street Church, in which he expressed his belief that it is no part of the duty of the school to teach religion, rather the principles and duties of good citizenship, the other by Leslie Lewis, Esq., one of our public school superintendents, who dwelt upon the claims the public school has upon the people. These he based upon the work the school has accomplished for the people and especially for the citizens of Chicago. It has given us one language, it has taught us how to be tolerant in our religious views, it has put down the spirit of caste and, more than all, has insisted on the virtue of obedience. For a people like ours, composed of different elements, this work of the school has been indispensable. Mr. Lewis has had large experience and is an enthusiastic believer in the public school as a civilizer of the people. He believes also in the wisdom of introducing ethical instruction into the schools and therefore favors the use of a book of selections from the Bible, to which reference has already been made. In the afternoon President Gates of Iowa College read a paper on Education for the Kingdom of God, and on Tuesday afternoon one on The Teacher as a Trainer for Service. Both papers were full of good thoughts clearly expressed. While not all would accept his views or admit his statement of facts, no one could fail to sympathize with his aim or find fault with the spirit in which he spoke. The Appeal of the City's Life to the Public Schools was presented by Rev. W. E. McClennan.

Other Papers Read During the Week.

A paper which made a deep impression was on the Need of Beauty. In this paper the mission of beauty in education was pointed out. The paper was prepared and read by Miss Josephine C. Locke, who is superintendent of art instruction in our public schools. Three papers by Rev. Dr. D. M. Fisk of Toledo, O., on Education for Life, or a plea for the recognition of the whole nature of an individual in education, on Education by Life, or a statement of the method of culture by life imparted from above, and Education for Life, in which the purpose or goal of culture was emphasized, were among the best presented. Mr. Fisk makes no hasty statements. He brings out principles which, in a mechanical system of education, are in danger of being overlooked. He believes that education in morals, and therefore spiritually, is quite as important as the knowledge commonly imparted through school-books. It is hardly necessary to say that his standards of a teacher's qualifications are very high, and that no one who has not been brought under the influence of that altruistic motive introduced into the soul by the spirit of God can reach them. Col. F. W. Parker, principal of the Cook County Normal School and an educator of repute, gave an address on the Ideal School. This he regards as a place where the pupil is taught how to find himself, and what the reasons of things are, rather than things themselves or mere words. Colonel Parker is a friend of kindergartens, manual training schools and object lessons. He has done a great deal in clay modeling and sets his pupils to teaching as soon as they come under his care. The social value of manual training was pointed out by Prof. H. H. Belfield, the head of the Chicago Manual Training School, in a lecture of real value. There were lectures also by Prof. A. W. Small of the University of Chicago, Professor Chamberlain on the social value of training in sacred music, Professor Tomlins on the social function of music, Mr. John Gavitt, late city editor Hartford Post, on the newspaper as a social educator, and by Professor Taylor on the progress of the practical purpose in education.

The Commons now has eighteen residents and seems to be getting hold of the community round about. A little paper edited by Mr. Gavitt, who, with his wife, has recently joined the Commons, will be published every month and will help to keep the public acquainted with the work undertaken and accomplished. The conferences this week must have been helpful for teachers, of whom a good many have been present. Many of our ministers have also been present both to speak and ask questions.

The Vrooman Matter.

The question on the admission of Mr. Vrooman to presbytery does not seem to have been settled by the vote of the majority in his favor. The minority who voted against him, and who have framed an appeal to the synod, is likely to increase in numbers. The course of Mr. Vrooman himself is responsible for this. His statements concerning the Nicene Creed, the apostle Paul and Christianity have led such peace-loving, fair-minded men as Dr. Withrow of the Third Church to change front on the question and join those who doubt the wisdom of recognizing a man with Mr. Vrooman's opinions as a sound Presbyterian. The four hours' debate in presbytery over the matter on Monday indicates the importance attached to it.

Dr. Henson and Dr. Harper.

Dr. Henson is preaching what he calls a stumbling block series of sermons. They are upon subjects which have been made the object both of ridicule and honest doubt. They relate chiefly to belief in the statements found in the Pentateuch and especially in Genesis as expressive of the facts of actual history. Naturally Dr. Henson looks upon Dr. Harper as a disturber of faith in the authority and trustworthiness of the Bible. Newspaper reports have certainly made the hostility of Dr. Henson to Dr. Harper appear much greater than it actually is, although he confesses to great disappointment in the course the university has taken, and in the influence trustees not in sympathy with the views which he holds are having in its management. Dr. Harper wisely refuses to say anything in reply to the criticisms made upon him, and prepares courses of lectures for the summer term which will be certain to attract a large number of hearers. Those who know Dr. Harper best know that while his personal attitude toward the higher criticism is favorable he is doing all he can to prevent its advocates from disturbing the foundations of a genuine Christian faith.

CURRENT THOUGHT.

AT HOME.

The essential points of a true American policy respecting Turkey at the present moment are summed up under the following five heads in the May Review of Reviews: First, prompt and full payment of the indemnity demanded months ago on account of the buildings and property of Americans destroyed in Harpoot early last November, together with permission for immediate rebuilding. Second, the establishment of United States consulates at Erzroom and Harpoot, as provided for by Congress in January, 1894. Third, the prompt investigation of the malicious charges of sedition which have been prepared against Mr. Knapp, and which have been prepared against others also. Fourth, a reparation for the violation of American rights in the case of Mr. Knapp, who, contrary to promises made directly to our United States minister, has been torn from his family in Bitlis and, regardless of health or convenience, is being hustled out of the country. Fifth, the increase of our naval force in Turkish waters, with the permanent location of a gunboat at Constantinople. It adds: "But it is to be feared that these gentlemen in authority [in Washington] are taking their advice from the wrong quarters, and that they are not sufficiently well informed concerning the nature and history of American missionary and educational work in the Turkish empire, and scarcely appreciate the permanent rights of protection that a half-century of diplomacy and treaty-making have established in behalf of these interests." The Watchman (Baptist) is aroused over the inactivity of our State Department at Washington. "There is no use concealing the fact that the protection of American citizens who are missionaries is distinctly unpopular with our political managers. . . . The deliberateness with which the department moves in matters of this kind is explicable and discreditable. . . . There are no votes redressing the wrongs of the missionary."

Zion's Herald, commenting on the exchange of pulpits between Drs. Herrick and Hale, says: "It is to be regretted that the general public infer so much from this incident. For this reason we deplore that the exchange was made. The Congregational church is understood to stand for something positive concerning the person of Christ. Unitarianism, as a church, stands for want of faith or disbelief in the deity of Christ—the most fundamental doctrine of evangelical Christianity." And The Christian Register (Unitarian) frankly admits that "this is by no means the first time that Trinitarian and Unitarian Congregational ministers have exchanged with each other since the separation of these bodies. Such exchanges are destined to become more frequent, especially as neither in the orthodox nor the Unitarian body is there any law forbidding it. It is a matter solely between individual churches and ministers. Nor does action of this kind imply identity of opinion or conviction upon theological issues. It does imply relations of fraternal and professional fellowship, that each regards the other as a minister of the gospel and as worthy to feed his own or his neighbor's flock."

The Evangelist makes most astounding charges respecting the maneuvering now going on within the Presbyterian Church. "Once more, then, we raise the warning cry, 'Down with the machine!' Let no mere machine-made moderators preside over our assemblies. Once more, too, we enter the plea for a return to the old ways of conducting church business in openness, honesty and charity. The domination of a party has bred evil, the determination to keep that party in power by bare majorities, no matter how secured, is working out something so like political corruption as to deceive even the elect. Let us put away the works of darkness and walk as children of light and the day!"

REV. DR. E. K. ALDEN.

A MAN OF PRAYER, CONSECRATION AND CONVICTION.

BY REV. CHARLES H. DANIELS, D. D.

The greatness of a man is the greatness of the purpose which controls him. There is but one supreme purpose, namely, to do the will of God. "Wist ye not that I must be about my Father's business?" was the keynote of the greatest life of earth. It is written of Enoch that "he walked with God, and was not; for God took him." The same words might be written as the biography and obituary of Rev. Edmund K. Alden, D. D., who passed on Thursday last as by a translation to the homeland after seventy-one years of walking with God. They were years of able, active, prayerful service for Jesus Christ and his kingdom; they were filled with a great missionary purpose. The intense missionary ideal did not lead to a passive condition of the heart nor to a self-centered cultivation of inner graces—peace, joy, calm—but rather to a self-sacrificing, outgoing, constant ministry, whether as pupil and teacher or pastor and secretary. In such a ministry, following him who came to serve and to give his life a ransom for many, Dr. Alden spent twenty-four years in intimate relation to the American Board, seventeen of them as a corresponding secretary. Here the life motive is distinctly traced. In the secretaryship intellectual ability and warm heart devotion, clasping hand in hand, characterized the daily routine of its duties, its plans for developing in the churches the spirit of benevolence and its wider utterances upon the platform and in the pulpit.

Character is a grand word and its lines must be drawn through both the seen and the unseen. The character of a man is brought out by the great thoughts which control him. There were no themes so closely allied to Dr. Alden's life purpose as those of duty, privilege and personal responsibility in the work of foreign missions. With all the sturdiness of his faith, every line of it pointed him to this one thing. He did believe in foreign missions. He saw the world lying in wickedness. For this world Christ had made an atonement sufficient for all its sins and the ministry of reconciliation is committed to men. We shall catch the spirit of this ministry if we can but recall some of those remarkable addresses of Dr. Alden at the annual meetings of the Board. We could wish for no more clarion-like voice to call the churches to a sense of personal responsibility for a lost world than his paper, The Proclamation of Christ Among all Nations. "Every individual who receives the Gospel receives it in trust, to be by him communicated to all mankind." No more needed inquiry has been addressed to the churches of late than that of another paper, Shall We Have a Missionary Revival? "Has the period arrived when, all else being subordinate to this controlling idea, we may look for that full outpouring of the Holy Spirit upon the churches, which shall be directed mainly to the widespread propagation of the gospel of Christ among the unevangelized nations?" Such a revival meant to him devotion to the mighty truths of man's peril without the gospel, the riches of the atonement provided and the sacred trust of giving the glad tidings. No more thrilling record of prayers and their answers, no more persuasive exhortation to prayer, as our absolute reliance, can be found than in that other paper, The Place Occupied in Missionary Work by Prayer. This wonderful discussion is still fresh in its inspiration.

These three addresses, as samples of others, may distinctively suggest phases of the author's character and life purpose. He felt conscious of personal responsibility for the world's redemption. At any cost he accepted the service as offered. It was a sacred trust to be administered with unflinching devotion. It was a trust defined by personal apprehension of God's truth and that became final as a law of action. He had faith in foreign missions as a promoter of revivals. Herein was breadth of vision and profound grasp of truth. Ordinary revivals do not, to his mind, permanently change tendencies to worldliness and ease, "Only a thorough missionary consecration goes down deep enough to upheave the whole soil and make it fruitful unto every good work." The long experience and touch with missionary work made Dr. Alden an expert in the lessons of answered prayer. With such experience even the skeptic would be forced to believe in prayer. To him prayer was a part of his life, a fact well understood by those who knew him the best. Few men living were more familiar than he with the whole history of concerted prayer for missions. He loved to quote that which he loved to practice: "We are responsible not only for all we can do ourselves, but for all we can secure from God."

The life work of a good man must rest upon and grow from a strong, abiding foundation of truth. It was the glory of this life that his calling rested upon God's sure word of promise, "He shall have dominion from sea to sea, and from the river unto the ends of the earth"; and upon Christ's command, "Go ye and disciple all nations." Upon this broad foundation grew a life and work of strong and rugged proportions. His was a faith which could endure testing; his were convictions for which he was willing to stand alone, misunderstood, often blamed. The strongest characters in all history have been those controlled by deep convictions and kindly charity. In times of greatest trial and intensest debate not one heated reply came from Dr. Alden's lips nor from his pen. The writer of this bears his testimony to one fact, that in a long acquaintance, official and personal, he never heard an unkind word spoken of another from the lips of Dr. Alden. In this he was a remarkable man. It is difficult to say in which particular he excelled, whether in his power of putting a case which he had once understood in its truth and facts, or in his power of not stating his views when he felt that silence was the safest course. We have marveled at his power in the latter case, as we have been persuaded by him in the former. Truth stood clear in his mind and from its logic he did not shrink. The men were few who could plead a case with the precision and power of Dr. Alden. The work of foreign missions is clearer and dearer to us because of his inspiration.

Laying aside his active duties in connection with the American Board two years and a half ago, he returned gladly and easily to the old habits of the pastor in his study, and to his friends he often said, "I am reading my Bible." This was his one book, the whole Bible. He took no privileges with its full inspiration; he desired for it no supplement. With the book of God and with the book of providence, which he delighted to study, he had chart and compass for life's journey of both storm and sunshine. "He walked with God, and was not; for God took him."

THE SURVIVAL OF THE FITTEST.

BY REV. A. H. QUINT, D. D.

No. It is not true. It is a heartless falsehood.

To survive is to outlive. Fittest for what? Fittest to live. To live is to do the work which God has given one to do, with the powers which God has given, and in obedience to him who gave the work and the powers. Life is love. Life is patience. Life is wisdom. Life is faith. Whoso has these has fitness to continue to live. The fittest are those who have the most of these.

They who accomplish best the true object of living as God designed them to live, they who illustrate best the divine power of a pure and noble life, they who spread the sunshine of God where otherwise were darkness and chill, they who comfort and console and strengthen, these are the best fitted to live. They are the ones, who, according to our dim vision, ought to survive. They are the ones, who, according to "the survival of the fittest," will survive.

For fitness in God's true world consists in something higher than the bones of an animal or the muscles of a wild beast. It means mental and spiritual life. If one would limit the phrase which I have quoted to the low grade of the animal, he perverts the words, and his ideas are not high enough to make discussion spiritually profitable. If he conceives of God only as embodied in a ruthless force, marching on through the ages, scattering into destruction on the right hand and on the left all that is weak or needy, he is out of the range of an intelligent fatherhood and a suffering brotherhood.

But does the fittest survive? No. Judged by any actual standard it is impossible to find such a law. The cultivated fruits which skill and patience have learned how to fashion are short-lived. The greater the refinement of generations the less is the certainty of perpetuity. I do not say that this is inevitable, but I do say that no one can shut his eyes to the fact that this supposed law is utterly absent from what we see in daily life.

We see the student under the Bonnie Brier Bush, just ready by his mental endowments and his spiritual experiences to be a power for good in the world. The author of that story pictured life, when the visible life went out. The author has pictured other characters. Did the fittest for God's work survive? Who has not seen similar instances everywhere? Who has not seen the most promising teachers of Christ's love suddenly taken away, while the ignorant and the profane keep on? Who has not seen some man in society, upright, philanthropic, inspiring, whose influence spread goodness around him, pass from sight, while the profligate and the intemperate survive? The coarse outlives the refined; is it therefore the fittest for this life? The selfish outlasts the generous; is it the fittest? The corrupt outlasts the pure; is it the fittest? The inhuman outlasts the gentle; is it the fittest? The Turk survives his victims; is ferocity the fittest?

I know well enough that somebody will say that I do not take the words as some thinkers usurp them. They are a high-sounding formula which must be limited to mere physical things, and mean toughness, not fitness. Then why not say so, and not pervert language? Even on this ground they are not proven. They would mean only that that survives which is powerful enough to survive. It would be hard to dispute such a tautological saying. But it omits even then the presence and power of an intelligent and loving God who does "not break the bruised reed, nor quench the smoking flax." It excludes tenderness and love and mercy and fatherly care. It forgets a suffering and divine Saviour, a supernatural spirit, a redemptive love. But the words must be taken as they read and sound. Ah me, they are not true. The fittest to adorn and honor life, to fill needful places in loving hearts, to do good in the spirit of Christ—do they survive? Parents whom, in my ministry of these years, I have found suffering unspeakable sorrow, do you admit that those whom you mourned disappeared because of the law of fitness which ruled them out of life? Was the scientific assertion, if anybody had the savageness to use it, anything but a torturing insult? Were you not forced to compare the pure-hearted, the loving, the useful, the good with a multitude of the useless, the unfaithful, the selfish? Did you not wonder at the inscrutable mystery which ended the earthly life of your dear ones who were so well fitted to live? You ran against the darkness which no one can explain. You were driven into the region of faith alone; faith which rises above the machinery of a machine deity into the spiritual grandeur and glory of a spiritual realm. No philosophy sufficed for you. No magnificent conceptions even of the material life of the ages were your comfort. When loving friends send messages to the stricken, these messages are always about the loving Father and his tender heart, about the careful Shepherd of the Psalmist, about the blessed Elder Brother and his cross, and about the heavenly land where the departed walk in eternal joy. Hearts meet hearts in loving touch and the lesson is learned that no theories can stand which in any way ignore the heart. In the calm of the hiding place with God there is a knowledge which disdains the conclusions of a reason that leaves out the essential of life.

Not long ago a life went out from sight. It was a brilliantly gifted life, a sunny, patient, brave, useful life; a life of often self-denial to enable her to help others. In it was recognized the nobility of a yet early but high womanhood. That life was always watchful to make others happy. It was a life of devoted love to parents and brothers and sister. It illustrated the capacity for usefulness of a life hid with Christ in God. When that life went out of the visible was it because of lack of fitness for God's work here? That it was so nobly fitted is what makes the mystery. The mainspring of this life in its relation to others was well found in a favorite extract from some author which was carried out in daily act, which had been copied for a near friend and sent not long before departure. It was read where the casket with all that it stood upon was utterly hidden by the masses of rare and beautiful flowers which lavish friends had bestowed; read as the testimony, still better than these, to her life. I quote the extract in the hope that it may become an inspiration to some similar life:

Do not keep the alabaster boxes of your love and tenderness sealed up until your friends are dead. Fill their lives with sweetness. Speak approving, cheering words while their ears can hear them, and while their hearts can be thrilled and made happier by them. The kind things you meant to say when they are gone, say before they go. The flowers you meant to send for their coffins, send to brighten and sweeten their homes before they leave them. If my friends have alabaster boxes laid away, full of fragrant perfumes of sympathy and affection which they intend to break over my dead body, I would rather they would bring them out in my weary and troubled hours and open them, that I may be refreshed and cheered by them while I need them.

She had such blessedness in her own life, and she gave it richly to others. Can one tell why such a life ends so early here? No. Faith understands that it was God's perfect will.

And yet those thus fitted for the highest living do survive. They merely pass on, and they see the King in his beauty.

HOURS WITH DR. O. W. HOLMES.

BY HERBERT D. WARD.

Montaigne once said that a strong memory is commonly coupled with infirm judgment. No one who has not labored under the disadvantage of a halting memory can appreciate the comfort of this philosophy. Again, the same writer tells us that "few of those who have possessed such extraordinary powers of memory have been men of first-rate talent." Indeed, modern lightning calculators of the stage variety type have well proved Montaigne's position on this subject. Personally, like many a wiser, I have come to depend on note-books in a way that would have made the late President Seelye of Amherst College frown with disapproval. He used to teach his students to glorify the province and the power of memory. But why, when exact knowledge lies within the two covers of a note-book, torture our poor brain-cells, only to resurrect a notion as hazy as it may be erroneous?

In trying to recall my impressions of Dr. Holmes, I well remember several delightful calls upon him in his Beacon Street study of broad view. I remember his driving sixteen miles from Beverly Farms to East Gloucester the summer before he died. But here again, was it the last summer, or that before the last? The note-book is blank on that point. He stayed only an hour and had a wonderful talk about immortality over a cup of tea with my wife. How exasperating not to recall a sentence of it!

I have often wondered whether it would be immoral to hide a stenographer behind a convenient curtain when great experiences are interchanged. I believe a verbatim report of the aged poet's conversation that afternoon would be as immortal as any chapter from his Autocrat. For most of those who knew him think that he was as much inspired by the presence of a congenial soul as he was by the pen, or by the great unknown but loving public. Dr. Holmes could talk better than he could write, which is saying the most one can.

But I do remember another time when we had a phonograph hired for the winter that he took a trip out to our little rented cottage near Boston. It was a cold, bleak day. Two of the poet's most intimate friends came out with him. His enjoyment over the new instrument (which, after Mark Twain, we would say is, at best, a plaything with a college education) was as keen as a schoolboy's. He listened to several "records" with a lively and twinkling interest. Especially was he amused by the phonographic barking and yapping of our little dog, who, though he may die, yet can still bark on.

It was with a slight difficulty that we persuaded the poet himself to talk into the mysterious cone. He was a trifle embarrassed at first and cracked many a joke about the seriousness of saying something that might be repeated aloud every day for a thousand years. What should he say? What would be of sufficient dignity to outwit the criticism of posterity?

"Why not repeat some of your poems?" some one suggested.

"I want to stand up—I can talk l ′er on my feet," he said.

So we changed the mouthpiece to a huge paper cone and pointed it, like a six inch gun, at the Autocrat.

At first his voice was trembling and husky, as if gauging itself for the effort. But soon it grew vigorous, as he repeated:

Ay, tear her tattered ensign down!
Long has it waved on high!

But when he came to the closing lines:

And give her to the God of storms,
The lightning and the gale!

his voice was as strong as it must have been at forty and as enthusiastic as when he wrote the great poem that saved the historic ship from shame.

He ended by repeating the last verse of the Chambered Nautilus. It was a treasure in my life to hear him give with full tone the lines that form the high water-mark of his genius, and which will live as long as American literature. When he came to the noble end:

Till thou at length art free,
Leaving thine outgrown shell by life's unresting sea, there was a loving silence in that room. We looked through tears at him who could not be with us long. And he, as if realizing the reflex meaning of his words, sighed deeply. But with a boylike laugh he quickly broke the spell and said, "Now let me hear myself talk."

This frail cylinder, perhaps the only "record" extant of the voice so many loved to hear, is packed away carefully—one of the most precious relics in our possession. Some day we may bring it out, and summon his spirit and listen to his words. But it is not he. It is only the mysterious reverberation of the shell which he has outgrown; and we shrink from the experiment, as if it might be almost the profanation of a tender memory.

At another time, perhaps a couple of years later, I had occasion to take a walk with Professor Henry Drummond, while he was in Boston giving his Lowell lectures, I think. Like a typical Scotchman, he started out on a swinging ten-mile tramp. By the time we had reached the Harvard Bridge I began to be thoroughly alarmed as to personal consequences if we kept it up at that gait. I suggested that we turn up Beacon Street and call on Dr. Holmes instead. He took the bait like a trout.

"Dr. Oliver Wendell Holmes!" he exclaimed.

"Of course. There is no other. It's only a short distance." Professor Drummond's sensitive face flushed with anticipation.

"I have always wanted to meet him," he said, "and I never had the chance. Can you introduce me? I shall consider it the best part of my American trip."

So we rang the bell, sent up our cards and were soon ushered into the famous library. Dr. Holmes was standing at the door, straight, elegant and benign, waiting to give us his characteristic welcome. Again I wished for that stenographer to be hidden behind the curtain to take down every breath of wit, reminiscence, of experience, of gentleness, of exquisite sentiment that fell from our friend's lips—all perfect in form and in polish as fresh as an eagle proof from the mint. To listen to him was always a new revelation of his breadth and power and courtesy. In the course of a good many interviews with him I never heard from him one word derogatory even to the most unscrupulous of autograph fiends, or of the most impertinent of lion hunters. Dr. Holmes was a gentleman to the last fiber, and his harshest criticism was offered with a kindliness that was winning.

I sat still while the two talked. Each was familiar with the other's best work. The reverence of the younger man and the cordiality of the elder soon passed beyond courteous veneer into reality.

When we had reached the sidewalk after the memorable interview, of which I remember so little, Professor Drummond stopped me and caught my arm. He said with eager enthusiasm: "He is the most wonderful man I ever saw! He is so young—so bright, like a meteor. I have talked with Gladstone and with all the greatest men in England, Europe and Australia, and I can say that Dr. Holmes, as a conversationalist, beats them all."

But at one time, and at one time only, I did take notes of Dr. Holmes's marvelous table talk. Even after an interval of only a few hours the bouquet—that indescribable magic peculiar to himself alone—had passed beyond transcription.

It was at a small dinner where my wife and I were guests. There were seven in all—a sacred number. I am sure my readers will pardon me if I copy word for word the crude notes. They will have a verity which elaboration might mar. The day was Jan. 27, 1893.

"Dr. Holmes came in at exactly 1 30

Mrs. —— drew him up to the fire and toasted his feet. Dr. Holmes seemed a little deaf and short-sighted at first. He complained of the snow having an effect upon his hearing. He began to talk immediately. He asked —— and Mrs. W. what part of the year they best liked to write. —— answered in the fall. Mrs. W. said in the winter. Dr. Holmes preferred to write in the morning from 9–11.30. He said he was born again every morning and was as fresh as a child for his work. He referred to his way of talking so freely about himself. He called himself an autophile. He said: 'We are all interested in ourselves and love ourselves. We ought to.' He said something about a person's (especially a poet's) composition being a cast from his own mind. It fits him and nobody else. That is the reason poets like their own works. 'Why is it,' he said, 'that my lines ending the cellar and the well are better than anything else that describes desolation? Because they are the only ones that recognize that the last things left are holes in the ground. They are eternal landmarks of desolation.' He turned to us and asked if any of us were Episcopalians. Miss —— said she was. 'I have nothing agin ye,' he flashed, laughing, 'it is the church of Dives.'

"He said a great deal about Phillips Brooks. 'I miss him. He was far above me in my little world.' He thought Aldrich and Stedman were the most important poets we had left. He said that when he went into a church and took up a hymn-book he always put his hand over the author's name while reading the hymn. He could invariably place Watts, Wesley or Doddridge. The modern hymn writers were too self-conscious—given up to style, rhetoric—their minds were on their earrings. The old fellows had the deep, true religious feeling. He said he never could mistake a modern or ancient hymn writer. He always thought when his life work got to senility he would begin and write some good hymns.

"He talked a while about Dr. S. F. Smith, his classmate. 'Smith would live,' he said, 'on that one poem of his, when all the rest of us were forgotten. Smith never knew how he did it, but no academies could improve on that hymn. It comprehended the whole thing. What a stroke of genius My country, rather than Our country! It made it a personal affair. Thy groves and templed hills! A fine line! But I could not understand the that, in Like that above. I once asked Smith, who said he meant like that rapture above.' After a further and warm eulogy he ended in a playful way: 'I have always been class poet, and here this fellow comes up and thrusts me out with a dig in the ribs.'

"He always suspected a little the tenderness of old age. Life bruised old age like an apple until it got tender. Then the tears came easily. He was speaking about crying over Barrie's Window in Thrums. He turned around to Mrs. W. and said, 'You have made me cry a great many times.' 'I am sorry,' was the answer. Waving the chance for a repartee, he laughed and said under his breath, 'I hate to go above you.' He left the general impression of extreme vitality of ideas and originality of statement. His alertness was remarkable. He said he could not be a student because he got saturated with a book so soon that his mind capered off." Thus ends the hurried record.

When above eighty years of age Emanuel Swedenborg wrote to a friend about his youth: "From my sixth to my twelfth year I used to delight in conversing with clergymen about faith, saying that the life of faith is love, and that the love which imparts life is love to the neighbor; also that God gives faith to every one, but that those only receive it who practice that love." This describes the life and faith of Dr. Holmes, who was a man of God without always knowing it.

Would that the loved Autocrat had had his Boswell or his Eckermann! I am sure that such table talk would be given to the world as it has not heard or read since the days of Johnson or Goethe. We have awaited impatiently the biography of Dr. Holmes, just issued, hoping that it may contain much of that wonderful power which used to astonish and electrify those who came in contact with our dear poet.

THE KUMIAI CHURCHES OF JAPAN, AND THE DOSHISHA.

BY REV. J. H. PETTEE.

Another annual meeting of the Kumiai churches has just passed into history. It was held at Kyoto and was preceded by a day's devotional services at Uji, a suburb of Kyoto and a far-famed tea-growing town. This preliminary meeting much resembled in spirit and tone the now historical Nara Conference, held last October. No formal action of any sort emanated from this as from the Nara gathering, but the pastors and evangelists drew nearer together and closer to God in a quiet, spiritual fellowship.

The Sokwai proper was attended by some sixty voting delegates, representing probably forty-five churches. After a contest extending over several years, the weaker churches have finally secured a signal victory, which marks a noteworthy advance in the history of the denomination. Up to the present year only independent churches have been allowed a voting membership in the annual meeting. T[illegible] year by an overwhelming majority the [illegible] was changed. Henceforth, dependent [illegible]urches are entitled to one vote each, and [illegible]ndependent churches to two each.

Independence has been considered the special glory and principle of the Kumiai body. To keep this prominent before the minds of all, the money qualification has been rigorously enforced at annual meetings. But now the independence of the Home Missionary Society, which began in January of the present year, emphasizes the principle in so public a manner that it is felt possible to relax a little when the Japanese are by themselves. Hence the change which pleases all except a few of the stalwarts, whose single watchword is complete independence.

Reports from the churches were discouraging so far as figures go. Only 266 baptisms were reported, and there is said to be a net loss of over 1,100. The exact figures are not available as I write. It should be remembered, however, that some of the churches have purposely revised their rolls and thrown out many useless, or worse than useless, names. Also that the Okayama Orphan Asylum Christians and some others have withdrawn nominally from the denomination and become Independents in the Western sense of that word. It is also highly probable that some churches failed to send in any report. Beyond this it should be added that the money-making fever burns in the veins of Christian as well as non-Christian Japan, and leaves few channels through which the fires of the Spirit may burn their course. But all feel that brighter days are ahead.

Reference was made to the report of the deputation. The excellence of its spirit and conclusions was gratefully recognized. It was felt, however, that the reference to the Doshisha contained therein involved the good name of the whole Kumiai body to such an extent that an investigating committee was called for to mediate between the missionaries (Board) and the Doshisha, and offer counsel to either or both parties as might seem necessary. The committee carefully selected consists of three pastors, Rev. Messrs. Osada, Koki and Miyaki, and two laymen, Messrs. Yokota of Kobe and Saibara of Osaka, the latter a lawyer.

The trustees of the Doshisha are greatly exercised over the report of the deputation. They feel deeply grieved, not to use too strong an expression, over the charge of having compromised, or being in danger of compromising, their Christian principles. They are now in session and will shortly speak for themselves.

It is a critical time in the history of the school. The trustees are greatly embarrassed. They feel under a cloud, so far as their American constituency is concerned, and they are by no means sure of a Japanese backing if they formally break from the mission. They face a large deficit for the coming year and the possible estrangement of many old friends. They assert boldly their unchanged attitude towards Christianity, and declare that all implications to the contrary, by whomever made, do them grave injustice. I am not at liberty to write fully on the subject, but I may add this much—a clear distinction ought to be drawn in every one's mind between the personal religious convictions of individual trustees and their corporate ideas as to what is befitting a Christian school. There is an honest difference of opinion between the Japanese trustees and teachers and their associate American friends as to the best manner of conducting a Christian school of high intellectual grade. There is a grave difference of opinion on the moral, not legal, bearing of the property question.

Whatever may be thought of the conclusions reached by the deputation it cannot be forgotten that these were the outcome of a wide variety of testimony and that some of the Doshisha's severest critics were Japanese. Also, I regret to add, it is not so much the decision itself as the publication of it that gives offense. It may be stated in this connection that the farewell letter of the deputation to the Kumiai churches, left with the Japanese early in December, was not published in Japan until this was made necessary by the arrival of American papers containing the translation of the same, and then the paper that published it added an elaborate article reviewing the history of the property question and throwing the blame for any misunderstanding thereon upon the missionaries. It is not my province to discuss the missionary or any other part of the matter, but simply to state facts known to the general public in Japan as they occur.

It is evident, however, that a school like the Doshisha can do nothing in a corner, that she must expect open criticism and must be ready to face it. I believe this to be the best thing for her, hard as it may be at times, and that a final and mutually satisfactory conclusion will be hastened by this unpleasant publicity. Even if that decision be not the first choice of many, it will be the second choice of all, and for that reason generally acceptable.

As for the work at large, more prayer and patience and persistent effort seem required before the larger blessing comes for which all wait and labor. The news of the lifting of the Board's debt brings great joy to every worker's heart. We at the front feel like bowing low in grateful appreciation to each one who helped make such cheering news a possibility. With this pæan of praise go the statement of conviction and the petition of devotion. Debts have no right to live. Let there never be another in the experience of the Board.

HYMN.

[Written for the meeting of the Woman's Home Missionary Association in Worcester, April 29, by Harriet Prescott Spofford.]

Lean from thy inner heaven, O Lord,
And let the holiness
That lives in thy unspoken word
Our beings bless.

Thou who art life, above us bow
From thy supernal shore,
Into our waiting spirits now
Thy fullness pour!

Thou who art love, let one swift sense
Of joy receive the spark
That kindles with thy immanence
The void, the dark!

Be all about us with the force
That warms, that stirs,
Send us forth thrilling from the source,
Thy messengers!

FATHER AND SON.

BY MRS. J. G. FRASER.

Somebody has said that what a mother has not done for her son in the way of molding his character before he is fifteen she can never do. There is much truth in this statement, but the case is quite different with the father. His season of greatest opportunity is when his son is between twelve and twenty.

With the first dawnings of manhood in the breast of a boy springs up a need, and usually a desire, for the close companionship of a man, and that man should be his father. Too often, however, it is the mother who arranges how and where his time shall be spent, who superintends his studies if they are superintended at all, and who purchases all his clothing; and the mother who selects clothes for a lad after he is eleven years old finds it a trying ordeal to both, as the boy begins to have an idea that women do not know what garments are suitable for a young man of his advanced years! Quite often, too, he is correct.

Even if the mother's taste and judgment are the better, still the older the boy grows the more difficult the matter becomes. More or less friction arises which is supposed to indicate the depravity of the boy, while in fact it may be an unconscious protest against having his mother do for him what is more naturally the duty of his father. If the latter takes him into a clothing store to select a suit of clothes it is an occasion of pleasure to the boy, for he is satisfied with the masculine judgment in selecting. This may seem a trifling matter but it is one of the many opportunities for the father and son to keep in touch.

It is during these years that the father should give some careful training in the principles of finance, to the end that his son may not grow up to swell the ranks of the multitudes who yield to the passion for spending more money than they possess, and who go through life hopelessly involved if, indeed, crime does not result. The father may judiciously take the boy into his confidence in regard to the family finances, and in this way teach him the importance of careful expenditure. This training may be supplemented from time to time by arranging that the boy shall render some service to his father or somebody outside the family, for which he shall receive compensation. This will help to teach the value of money and encourage a spirit of manliness and self-reliance.

The fact that his father takes the lead in planning for the boy need not make the impression of lack of ability on the part of his mother, but rather that it is the natural thing. The mother should have a share in all the family conferences, but it is unjust that she should be expected to carry the entire responsibility. However faithful and capable a mother may be she cannot successfully carry alone the cares and responsibilities connected with the training of a boy during the most difficult period of youth, when the father should more properly assume the heavier part.

Once when a mother was pleading with her husband to help plan for their son he replied, "O, Mary, you are doing all right; when I see any need for it I will take a hand." So she did the best she could alone with a heavy heart, and when the need of the father's help was apparent it was too late; the opportunity was gone.

Evenings and Sundays usually furnish the most favorable opportunity for cultivating this most important companionship. But, alas, long, quiet evenings and Sundays reserved for the family circle alone are mostly things of the past. Socials, religious meetings, clubs, concerts, drills, parties and other things take both father and son away from home most of the evenings. If they went to the same places it would not be quite so unfortunate, but usually they do not. Evenings at home are the best time for the father to acquaint himself with his boy's studies, his natural tastes, his habits of thought and his companions. No business interests, no social demands, no committee meetings, no sermon preparation or any literary work are as important as these evenings with the boy.

It is a serious question whether any man who has a son in his teens has a right to engage in any business or fill any position which necessitates his absence from home a larger part of the time, especially Sundays, unless support for the family cannot be secured in any other way. Duty does not call in opposite directions, and the interests of the kingdom will be promoted quite as successfully in the end if the fathers of young sons decline to engage in any business, or any philanthropic or religious work, which separates them from the home circle the larger part of the time. The boy has a right to claim this help from his father in his own behalf, and society has a right to expect that every father will extend the helping hand to his son as he steps from boyhood into manhood for the sake of what that manhood may mean to the world.

WHISTLING.

BY REV. I. W. SNEATH.

Why should not the art of whistling be utilized in the development of moral character? There is here an uncultivated field, which, if used, would bear good fruitage. There is no valid reason why the habit should be suppressed. On the other hand, there are good reasons why it should be cultivated in proper ways. It has been termed a "homely" art, but it has been clearly demonstrated that by practice really classical music can be whistled with great accuracy and with a peculiar charm for the listener.

The habit of whistling is due to various motives. We are all conscious of the familiar experience of whistling to sustain courage or to drive away fear. Dryden writes in Amphytrion of > Whistling to keep myself from being afraid.

He also refers to that other experience of which some of us may have had a taste in times past:

> He trudged along, unknowing what he sought,
> And whistled, as he went, for want of thought.

Whistling has often proven the means of making manifest a spirit of good feeling and contentment, and so Wilbye, in the poem Madrigal, speaks of contentment turning

> The homely whistle to sweet music's strain.

It has ever proved a source of entertainment to individuals, and in recent years "whistling soloists" have appeared upon the platform in public entertainments.

In former years whistling, like many other methods of music-making, was regarded as improper, if not profane, by the pious folk, and under no circumstances to be indulged in upon Sunday. More than once in boyhood days my good grandmother chided me for whistling on the Lord's Day. Moore satirically refers to this notion in his Sunday Ethics:

> For, bless the gude mon, gin he had his own way,
> He'd na let a cat on the Sabbath say "mew."
> Nae birdie maun whistle, nae lambie maun play,
> An' Phœbus himsel' could nay travel that day,
> As he'd find a new Joshua in Andie Agnew.

Today, when the sound of the piano, the horn and violin are heard in the homes of many on Sunday, the opposition to the familiar habit of whistling may also be said to have passed away. And now the question as to its proper use becomes the one of real ethical import. It is one of the earliest ambitions of childhood to learn to whistle. At the present time the majority of young whistlers, unrestrained, seize upon the popular "airs" of the opera and the ordinary theater. Through the street piano, band or various other agencies they soon come to know these tunes, and not infrequently whole households, parents and children, are found singing or whistling "Bowery" selections when hymns or sacred songs would prove more elevating, inspiring and helpful. It is also to be remembered that whistling may prove a source of blessing to others than the whistler himself. The sleepless watcher of the night is often cheered by the passing whistler. Many despondent hearts take new courage from the cheery disposition of a whistling boy or man.

If any moral and spiritual effects are to result from the art of whistling, parents must be interested in whistling boys. When the son returns from school whistling an ordinary street "air," it will be the mother's privilege to suggest how much more proper for him and how much more delightful for her if he would whistle Scatter Smiles and Sunshine or Onward, Christian Soldiers. Classical instrumental selections may also be suggested, which will at least produce a healthy effect upon the boy's taste if not to any appreciable extent upon his morals. I have noticed after wedding ceremonies that boys quite readily whistle the wedding marches. In like manner superintendents of Junior Endeavor Societies, secretaries of Junior work in the Young Men's Christian Association and the leaders of all boys' organizations can be helpful in making what is generally regarded a homely and useless art one of great significance in the development of character. Let us cultivate moral whistling and whistlers.

LOVE THYSELF LAST.

Love thyself last. Look near; behold thy duty
To those who walk beside thee down life's road;
Make glad their days by little acts of beauty,
And help them bear the burden of earth's load.

Love thyself last. Look far, and find the stranger
Who staggers 'neath his sin and his despair;
Go lend a hand and lead him out of danger,
To hights where he may see the world is fair.

Love thyself last. The vastnesses above thee
Are filled with Spirit Forces, strong and pure.
And fervently, these faithful friends shall love thee,
Keep thou thy watch o'er others, and endure.

Love thyself last; and O, such joy shall thrill thee
As never yet such selfish souls was given!
Whate'er thy lot, a perfect peace will fill thee,
And earth shall seem the ante-room of heaven.

Love thyself last; and thou shalt grow in spirit
To see, to hear, to know and understand.
The message of the stars, lo, thou shalt hear it,
And all God's joys shall be at thy command.

Love thyself last. The world shall be made better
By thee, if this brief motto forms thy creed.
Go follow it in spirit and in letter,
This is the Christ religion which men need.

FRESH AIR STUDIES.

THE PASSING OF THE BIRDS.

BY HOWARD E. PARKHURST.

The crest of the great migration wave in spring reaches the latitude of southern New York about the first of May and the middle of New England about a week later. With minor differences from year to year, there is remarkable uniformity in the great avian tides of spring and fall.

This periodical transit of millions of tiny creatures is a marvelous occurrence. Had we adequate vision, what strange clouds, large and small, could we see every night during these few weeks! These clouds are not of mist but of feathers, rolling up from the savannas of the Southern States, the isthmus of Central America, the West India islands and the broad plains and forests of Brazil. They sail swiftly in the windless air, and, like veritable clouds, when they reach our colder climate are precipitated in lively drops of color and clear notes of song upon woods and fields. Then, after a brief stay, they may be seen evaporating and scudding on to northern New England, Canada, and far up into Arctic regions, a few fiery-hearted atomies of hummingbirds finding a summer home in distant Alaska. There is nothing in bird life more wonderful than the stupendous passage of this delicate host, in its trackless journey of thousands of miles over all the continents of the world, with the unerring instinct of infallible nature.

To the bird student the importance of the spring migration is partly because the specimens are now in their finest plumage and are doubly conspicuous from absence of foliage on the trees. The various species are also in greater abundance than when they are dispersed in pairs. But its chief importance is in the fact that it gives almost the only opportunity of studying the numerous species that summer in more northern latitudes, the fall migration, for several reasons, being very unsatisfactory. Thus it is only for a comparatively short period that we can enjoy the fox sparrow, the brilliant-voiced, ruby crowned kinglet, some of the finest warblers, and a few of the flycatchers vireos, finches and thrushes.

The various families show distinctive tastes in their summer resorts and little fellow-feeling. But on the long journey, like sensible travelers, they sink many of their differences and are quite companionable, so that the same "cloud" sometimes contains several species. The most favorable places to look for a flock of migrants are where there is a thin sprinkling of trees and shrubbery, and especially near water, where vegetation is most forward and insects abundant. As the observer sees in a familiar haunt the same species regularly passing year by year, the interesting but apparently insolvable question arises whether they have favorite halting places on the way, so that we are at all likely to see identical specimens on successive trips. Some slight facts confirm this notion, and their other strong local attachments justify the idea.

Of the immense variety, including our own summer residents and mere migrants now pouring in upon us, one can do little more than mention the prominent groups. One of the largest and most distinctive groups is that of the "warblers"—delicate and brightly colored, the most showy group we have. About twenty-five species pass our way every spring. Comparisons are invidious, and yet I think the Blackburnian, black-throated, green-hooded, magnolia and Canada warblers hold our easy pre-eminence. Despite their name the "warblers" are more attractive to the eye than to the ear, as the song of most of them is quite unpretentious.

A small, graceful, greenly-colored group are the vireos, all of them delightful singers and very distinctive in song. Among thinly scattered trees, especially on a highway, one often hears in summer a prolonged and ecstatic strain of true feminine volubility and ardor—the warbling vireo; while in deeper woods, and later in the summer than almost any other bird, sounds the shorter but richer chant of the red-eyed vireo, often marred with a touch of petulance. The finch family, the largest in the world, gives us as many representatives as the warbler group. On the average they are larger and not so brilliant in color, though a few are extremely beautiful, while we count among them several notable singers, including the purple finch, American and English goldfinches and the rose-breasted grosbeak, in every way beautiful.

Nor must we omit to mention the effervescent wren, the meadow lark in open fields, with his strong, clear call, the various swallows that express in motion what is denied in voice, the gorgeous scarlet tanager—too handsome to be vigorous, the olive-vested pewee, that long summer sigh among the trees, the cuckoo, so slender, feminine and shadowy, and, with his sprightly martial strain, the masculine oriole. This is a most imperfect list of worthies culled from many groups, each giving its distinctive pleasure and satisfying a special mood.

But in the roll of honor let us place first the thrush family with its versatile membership, in which the demoralized catbird plays the prodigal son, and where we find our most constant friend, old robin, and that southern genius, the mocking-bird. Unique among our songsters, however, are our typical thrushes, of which the wood thrush, with his short but golden phrase, is the most familiar, and, as the gem of all the galaxy, the inimitable hermit thrush. Let no one be charged with extravagance in his wildest praise of this beautiful creature, for it seems the acme of bird-life. Form and bearing, song and plumage are in matchless accord. If any species have a soul 'tis this. Among its kind it is the queen of hearts, separated from all others by the invisible barrier of its own grace, and while its personality lifts the observer into the highest region of nature's refinement, its serene and soulful melody, floating on the air at the hush of nightfall, makes the peace of nature vocal, and fills the listener with the sanctity of song.

HENRY CLAY.

BY JEANNETTE A. GRANT.

A soul braver, stronger, more beautiful and more melodious than language could express.—Rev. C. M. Butler, Chaplain U. S. Senate.

Henry Clay was born in Virginia, April 12, 1777. His father was Rev. John Clay, a Baptist minister possessed of admirable qualities as a man and preacher. He died when his famous son was only four years old, leaving his noble wife with a large family and little means. From his mother Henry inherited his patriotism and from both parents energy and loftiness of purpose. The boy's schooling was the best his mother could give him, but far from satisfactory to his ambition. A little log schoolhouse and a drinking schoolmaster would seem decidedly uninviting to the lads of today, and so would the hard work after school hours which young Clay was obliged to do to help his mother provide food for the family. But the "mill-boy of the Slashes," as the neighbors called him when he rode one of the farm horses to mill, a bag of corn behind him, was learning many things which afterward made him the people's idol.

When he was fourteen his stepfather, Captain Watkins, a man of some influence, found him a place as clerk and errand boy in a store in Richmond, but, seeing how eagerly Henry improved every opportunity to learn, succeeded in getting him a position as clerk in the office of the Court of Chancery. This was a fine opening and the awkward and poorly dressed youth of fifteen made good progress during the next four years, going far ahead of the city youths who had been amused at his first appearance among them.

Young Clay's good penmanship recommended him to the scholarly Chancellor Wythe and, in doing his copying, he was brought into intimate relations which were a great benefit to an ambitious young man. From the venerable and philanthropic chancellor the future "Great Pacificator" imbibed strong objections to slavery and by him he was advised, after four years of copying and companionship, to study law. So faithfully had the boy always improved his time that at the end of a year he was admitted to the bar of Virginia.

Although a social favorite in his native State the young lawyer decided to begin his professional life in Kentucky, whither his mother and her family had already removed. This was in the year 1797 and Kentucky had been a State for only five years. In Lexington, the new State's capital, containing then but fifty houses, "Kentucky's favorite son," as he was called in after years, took up his abode. The state of society was such as to make lawyers a very necessary element, and most flattering success came to the almost penniless young stranger whose charming manners were as much appreciated as his legal prowess. In a year and a half he was married to Lucretia Hart, daughter of one of the foremost men in the State. At the end of ten years Henry Clay was in circumstances to serve that public which, for the remainder of his long life, found so many tasks for him to do—tasks to which he freely gave his time and talents and loving interest to the very last.

Henry Clay's first public act was a noble attempt with voice and pen to deliver his adopted State from the curse of slavery. But the time was not ripe for such measures and success was a long way ahead. When he was about thirty years old, in 1806, Kentucky sent him to fill a place in the United States Senate, made vacant by the resignation of one of her senators. At Washington he was cordially received by President Jefferson, whose disciple he had long been. A heavy surplus in the national treasury was troubling the President who, in his message of that year, suggested applying the money to internal improvement so greatly needed throughout our undeveloped country. For this measure Clay worked diligently, desiring to see his beloved country assume a dignified position among the great nations of the earth.

In 1811, as Speaker of the House of Representatives, Clay strove with all his marvelous eloquence to stir up the people to proper action concerning the indignities offered us by Great Britain, so that to him the country owed the benefits which followed the War of 1812. In 1814 he was at Ghent with four other commissioners, appointed by President Madison, effecting a treaty of peace with Great Britain.

The grandest feature of Clay's eloquence was his power to avert disaster, to pour oil upon the raging sea of political contention and reconcile, at least temporarily, those who were ready to sacrifice everything but their own opinions. The Missouri Compromise of 1821 was a superb example of his wonderful ability to win men. From that time till within a few years of his death, a period of twenty-six years, Henry Clay was a candidate for what is considered the highest honor the people of the United States have to bestow. But his friends were strangely helpless and his enemies strangely powerful in this matter, and his failure to receive the more than merited reward for his ceaseless service of his country adds a pathetic halo to his memory.

In 1824 Mr. Clay brought forward his famous "American System" for the protection of home manufactures and industries. In 1833, to avert civil war, he sacrificed his own opinions and by tireless exertion succeeded in effecting a tariff compromise which, for a season, reconciled the South and North. Slavery still continued to menace the Union that he loved and in 1850, an old man of seventy-three, broken in health, he made a speech which lasted two days and resulted in the Compromise of 1850, or what is called the Omnibus Bill.

It is a fashion of the day to concern ourselves only with the present, but no citizen of our noble Republic should ignore its past. The speeches of Henry Clay throw much light on subjects that are agitated at the present hour. His was a model public life. He loved honors and the people's approval, but he refused to accept them at the sacrifice of his principles. His own words strike the keynote of his character: "I would rather be right than be President."

Great occasions do not make heroes or cowards they simply unveil them to the eyes of men. Silently and imperceptibly as we wake or sleep, we grow and wax strong, we grow and wax weak; and at last some crisis shows us what we have become.—Canon Westcott.

THE YOUNG PEOPLE'S "HUSTLING" MINISTER.

A CONVERSATION RECENTLY OVERHEARD IN A CITY HOTEL PARLOR.

First Speaker: I see you have lost Dr. Blank from your church. What was the matter? I thought he was a first-class man, and he isn't very old. Isn't broken down, is he?

Second Speaker: O no, he's all right. Most of us older ones think, we know, there never was a better or more eloquent man in our pulpit. But the young people's society in our church cuts a great figure, you know, and they thought the Doctor wasn't quite up to date. They said they had no fault to find with his preaching, and they admit a better man never breathed, but they said he wasn't—well, I hate the word, but this is exactly what one of them said—enough of a hustler for them, so he had to go.

First Speaker: What sort of a man have you got now?

Second Speaker: O, a young fellow, his preaching is a little thin, but he hustles, so I suppose it's all right. The joke of it was that we old folks had to get together $2,000 before they could call the new man. We said, "Now you've frozen out our minister, why you can get a minister to suit yourselves, and we'll stand back and see what sort of work you make of it." But when they found he wouldn't come till he had $2,000 of his salary in hand, they went ahead trying to make it up among themselves, and, bless you! they couldn't raise more than a hundred and something dollars. We had to put our hands in our pockets and help them out, and we didn't do it with any too good a grace. Whether it is a part of that ridiculous pampering and spoiling of our children that foreigners accuse us of or not, I can't say. But it does seem to me perfectly absurd that we should let a posse of young folks, who really contribute almost nothing to the support of the minister, run the whole business.

First Speaker: Glad to get the young folks to come in on any terms, I suppose—got to, if you have any old folks twenty years or so from now.

Second Speaker: Well, there is something in that, and I don't want to undervalue their enthusiasm. But when Mr. D., the head and front of them all, gets up in the church meeting and tells us graybeards that they have made up their minds that things must be thus and so, and we know that all he contributes to the church fund is just eighty-four cents a month for his sitting, why, it comes a trifle hard. I don't know how we can get it into those young folks' heads that the ones who pay the bills have a little right to be considered. But we're in the back seats now, and likely to stay there for the present. You talk with the twenty or thirty leading men of our church and you'll find that they feel just as I do, but they keep as quiet as they can. They say if we had brought up our children a little better they might be more modest now. In the meantime it may be up hill or it may be down, I don't think the young folks care much, but our church is hustling.

Blessed are they among mortals who are never weary of their own company.

Closet and Altar

What Christ's prayer was all true prayers must be. You must pray with the great prayer in sight.

It is little we can bring to pass, but our will and desire may be large. Nay, they may grow until they lose themselves in the infinite abyss of God. Not that we ought to think within ourselves that we wish to be this or that, like such a saint or angel, for we ought to be much more than we can conceive or fathom; wherefore, our part is to give ourselves over to God, being wholly his. And if ye cannot be entirely his as ye fain would be, be as much his as ye may attain unto; but whatever ye be, be that truly and entirely; and what ye cannot be, that be contented not to be, in a sincere spirit of resignation, for God's sake and in him. So shall you peradventure possess more of God in lacking than in having.

—John Tauler.

O all-embracing mercy,
O ever-open door!
What should I do without thee,
When heart and eyes run o'er?
When all things seem against me,
To drive me to despair,
I know one gate is open,
One ear will hear my prayer.

—Oswald Allen.

In various places and on many occasions does Jesus pledge us to meet him in this life—at the cross, in the sacrament, in the crises of joy and sorrow—and now once again he appoints us a meeting place. It is the Valley of the Shadow, where, in the quietness and seclusion as in a lover's glade, he will expect us one day. Is there any spot on earth so common or so wild that it has not been transformed by love? Are there any places in our thought so beautiful as those where we kept tryste with those that were dearer than life? So Jesus . . . put a fair face on death, so that it becometh but his dark disguise as he returneth to receive us home.—John Watson.

Our highest blessedness is that we have immortal needs—needs which require eternity for their fulfillment. Eternally we shall need to be taken deeper into the unfathomable heart of God that we may learn to love as he loves. Eternally we shall need to pray the lofty prayer of Christ, "Thy will be done."—Lucy Larcom.

Bring your mind to God; bring it to him daily and hourly, and daily and hourly he will fill it with its true treasure.—George Bowen.

O Father of all mercies, we, thy servants, lift up our praises and supplications at thy footstool. Thou knowest our hearts and our needs. Grant us such blessings as we stand in need of. If our burden be a heart of unbelief, lift on us the light of thy truth and scatter our doubts. If we are weary and heavy-laden, give us the rest of the covenant of grace. If we have a name to live, while we are dead, send us an unction from the holy One. If we are panting after the follies of the earth, and laying up treasures here, show us the vanity of this world's possessions and enjoyments and put a new song into our mouths, even praise to our God. While we live may we live unto thee, and when thou callest us hence may death be gain unto us. Amen.

MY MOTHER'S PORTRAIT.

You ask for her dear picture, that my hand
Has not the skill to draw. A patient face
Where pain and care and sorrow left their trace;
Hair that is smoothed above the brow, a band
Of shining silver—angels in the land
Of peace have such an aureole to grace
Their foreheads; lips where one would place
Only pure kisses; eyes that have command,
Entreaty, love, mirth, pathos, rarely blent
In their kind glances. Nay I cannot paint
Her portrait, for the soul that is so sweet
Soars too far heavenward, as though 'twere lent
Only in part to earth. Picture a saint
And you will have her likeness then complete.

A NEW STORY OF AN OLD SONG.

The first time that the tender lyric, Home, Sweet Home, was sung in public was when an Indian, brooding over the death of his beloved squaw and papoose, committed suicide on the spot where they were buried. It was a time when the boundary lines between Georgia and Tennessee were in dispute, and the half-breeds were constantly making trouble. In order to harmonize contending factions our Government established a trading post there. John Howard Payne appeared on the scene, and on suspicion of inciting the Indians to insubordination was arrested and carried to the council house. With others he witnessed the burial of the heart-broken Indian and began softly singing to himself the song which has since echoed through every land on earth. The sequel is told by the Atlanta Constitution in these words:

General Bishop, who had kept a close scrutiny on his actions, heard the song and called Payne to him.

"Young man," said the stern old Indian fighter, "where did you learn that song?"

"I wrote that song myself," replied Payne.

"And where did you get the tune?"

"I composed that, also."

"Would you let me have a copy of it?"

"Certainly I will."

"Well, a man who can sing and write like that is no incendiary. Appearances may be against you, but I am going to set you free. I shall write out your discharge immediately and a pass to you anywhere you choose through the nation."

Payne had been housed at the home of a family living near by, and on his return there he exhibited his pass and related the circumstances. That was the first time that Home, Sweet Home, had ever been sung in public.

39. NUMERICAL.

A wee 1-2-3-4 who stays on our floor
Keeps us always wrought up with vague fears.
O, the 5-6-7-8's that would crush older pates
He has had in his life of five years!
Now 6-7-8 the blows he has had on his nose
Should have made it quite flat, you'd suppose,
But fie, such 2-3-4's! he will not even pause
When he's stumped all his poor little toes.
All will be quiet, when young 6-7-8-9-10
Wakes the house up to a sudden wild fright—
There, he's fallen off the front gate,
A bruised and begrimed little wight,
1-2-3-4-5-6-7-8-9-10 at his fix,
But—he'll do it again before night.

40. PROVERBS.

The following contains all the words of eight familiar proverbs. See if you can reconstruct them.

Turn your coat according to the tide, and you will wish too late to mend your way. The cloth deserves a good time; where there's haste send a cut alone, if not a thing more. Go! let no man wait for another one, it is never well enough done if there's less speed.

E. S. M.

41. ENIGMA.

A word I took; it made no sound—
The reason why you soon will guess,
But when I'd cut off half I found
The word itself contained no less.
I tried again; though less I left,
I took no more than half away,
When lo! to pay me for my theft,
The word had gone—and gone for aye.

HOW MANY AND WHAT?

My Dearest Polly: I must write you a line about the boat race and the tennis game, for I know how eager you will be to hear about them. Was not Harry's call opportune? He came just in time to go with us. We rowed to the course in our own boat and our boys terrified us, for they were so excited at the race I thought they would upset us. To our great delight, Charlie won. He was beaten last year, you know, so he was on his mettle and rowed with great animus, clearing the stake boat splendidly and coming in amid tremendous acclamations. The prize was a beautiful white bowl with a pinkish rim, perfectly lovely in shape and color. Joe was very much crushed at his defeat and looked as solemn as if he had been reading a Greek lexicon. But Charlie, on the contrary, was hilarious, as he had reason to be. Then we went to see the tennis match between Harry B. and Teresa. He made us laugh, for he gives the queerest little jump when he "lobs." Teresa beat him, however, so we were joyful.

You will be here next week yourself, so I only write this little line and shall count the days until you come.

Your devoted DOLLY.

The search for titles of Longfellow's poems, as required of solvers of No. 34, was entered into with much enthusiasm by a great many readers, of whom about thirty gave lists containing 50 titles. Several claimed 51 or more names, but in all cases careful revision has reduced the number to 50 or less. Several such titles as The Grave, of which only Grave is given in the puzzle, have been thrown out; but Woods in Winter has been allowed, as it has been evident to nearly every solver that, through some slip, the prepositions were transposed in the words "in the woods of winter." The 50 titles that seem to be unquestionably correct include the 48 given by the author of the puzzle, with the addition of Fire, and Song. The list selected from the tying ones as the neatest and best arranged is that of Eunice Coffin Preble, 353 Hammond Street, Bangor, Me., to whom the prize book has been sent.

The Conversation Corner.

DEAR CORNERERS: The first thing and the best thing I have to give you this week is a letter from our friend of the "Deep Sea Mission," Dr. Grenfell. It is dated at the Government House, St. John's, Newfoundland, where he had just landed (April 10) from his novel missionary trip "to the ice" with the sealing fleet. After saying that he had not yet heard from Pomiuk, although expecting to do so soon, he writes:

We killed 22,300 seals. I brought in ninety to one hundred myself. I had nearly one hundred cases of accident and sickness among the various ships and our own while out. One man was drowned under the ice, one had a broken leg, another got sick in another vessel and died on landing. Two steamers were crushed in the ice and lost, two more were broken down, and another was badly crushed and is still somewhere at sea. I hope she is safe. The other crews were saved. The ice was heavy and the weather boisterous, but even one who is a bad sailor would find it enjoyable in the ice, because it smooths the water and lessens motion.

I suppose for the first time in the sealing industry services were held on sealing steamers. God's blessing, I am deeply thankful to say, rested on the word. Several spoke of their determination to live more as children of the King by God's grace. Crowded in the filthy hold, often standing with men packed above and below, behind and before, I had the chance to speak of the living Saviour and his promised fellowship, and of seeing men drinking in the word. When I had gone around and seen my sick I always journeyed out on the ice-pans with the gangs of men, and had grand opportunities of knowing their temptations, needs and failings. Many of our crew (308 all told) were Roman Catholics, but who was who I know not. Most attended the preaching services, and I revel in joy that God's grace in some degree worked visibly in the hearts of men.

The deepest and most lasting conversation I had with any one man was with one who had a wound in his head, and was carried on chiefly while I dressed it. The weather was very bad, the ship rolled heavily, the cabin was small, dark and stuffy, and yet, marvel of marvels, without noble edifice, vestments, or ordained priest, God's Holy Spirit was seeking a human soul! . . . I leave by the first boat for England. Your brother in Christ, WILFRED GRENFELL.

I am sure we all rejoice with the good doctor in his success in the novel experiment of a missionary trip among those hardy sailors in their pursuit of "swiles" on the ice-pans of the northern ocean. Not many are such veritable sons of Neptune as to "revel" so heartily in the hardships and roughnesses which must be encountered in that service. He does it for the Master's sake, and may the Master's blessing go with him when he sails away for his summer's work among the foreign sailors and Eskimo shoremen of the farther Labrador! Then, if not before, we shall hear from his and our little friend, Pomiuk.

Here are two more foreign letters I have been waiting for room to give you.

63 GUILFORD ST., LONDON, ENG.

Dear Mr. Martin: . . . Don't you think the Cornerers would have liked to go with me last week to see the boys of Christ's Hospital eat their supper? They have what is called a "public supper" every Thursday evening in Lent. There were 510 boys who sat down to supper at the same time. They had only soup and bread and butter. The boys are all dressed alike in long blue coats or gowns, with knee trousers of the same color, long yellow stockings and low shoes. They wear no hats even in winter. The costume is the same worn by the first "Blue-Coat Boys" more than 300 years ago.

The boys sat on long benches beside the tables or knelt on the floor while evening prayers were read, and when supper-time actually came they whisked their legs over the benches and went to work on their bread and butter just as if there were not hundreds of people watching them. After supper a choir of the boys sang two hymns and the orchestra of boys played while the visitors were leaving.

Yesterday we went to see the "London Stone." It is supposed to have been in the center of the "Roman Forum in London," and was used to measure from all over England. It now stands thirty-five feet from where it used to be and is built into the wall of a church with an inscription over it in Latin and English. One afternoon we attended the service in Westminster Abbey and afterwards walked about and saw the many famous monuments, among them those of John and Charles Wesley and Sir Isaac Newton. I was surprised to see a tablet to Major André. In the chapels around the choir we saw the tombs of several of the kings and queens of England, among them those of Queen Elizabeth, Mary, Queen of Scots, and Henry VII. and his wife. We saw the place where Oliver Cromwell was buried at first, but when the Stuarts came back his body was not allowed to remain. I live in Grinnell, Io., and I think I know who it was who wrote from there in the Corner a few weeks ago.

KATHARINE M.

Thanks for this interesting letter about things we have all heard about. Our "Boston Stone," the remains of which some of our pilgrim Cornerers have seen, was doubtless named in memory of that. The other letter is a postal card and is from a "constant reader" and friend of the Corner.

Dear Mr. Martin: In the forty-eight hours since I landed from the Fulda (after a splendid voyage) I have seen more laughing-eyed, healthy children than in any similar period of my life. They seem to live, move and have their being on the street and, though some of them have to sell matches for a living and all of them beg whenever a green and innocent American comes into view, life nevertheless seems to be for them one long and glorious holiday. I met on the steamer Mr. ——, the New York publisher, and his wife, who knew "Whiskyboy" of Japan and were so pleased with the account of him in the Corner [see March 19] that they begged the paper to send to him. H. A. B.

Our acquaintance widens—who knows but we may hear from "Whiskyboy" himself yet!

And now from Arctic missionaries and European travels to American garden seeds:

BOSTON.

Dear Mr. Martin: I have a suggestion to make about those sweet peas the girl sent you [Corner, April 9]. If they are rare I should think that you could plant them, and when they grow up and were turning to seed that you could take the seeds and put them in packets and sell them and take the money for the benefit of the little Eskimo. WILLIE T.

A Connecticut boy writes to ask if he can get any of those seeds from Elizabeth if he should send the money. Just as I was thinking how I could answer these boys, a letter came from Elizabeth's father—her photograph in the letter shows that she is but a little bit of a blossom herself—which arranges the matter:

CHICAGO, ILL.

I wonder if your little Cornerer or some others would like more seeds to plant by themselves as a Pomiuk nest-egg, the blossoms to be picked from the vines to be sold for his fund. I will furnish packages to four Cornerers for a Pomiuk Sweet Pea Band, if they will plant them and let me know the result. May the Lord bless the band! I thought of Dr. Grenfell and his work when I read this week of several fishermen carried out to sea on the ice on the coast of Labrador. I never supposed it was quite so barren and uninhabitable. I have that book of Dr. G., The Vikings of Today [American edition just published in New York and sold in the Congregational bookstore], and we are much interested in it.

So there is a chance for two more seed-sowers! Address: "Elizabeth, 2725 North Lincoln Street, Station X, Chicago." If more than two write, they would better put in a stamp for reply as to seeds, which perhaps your own dealer can get for you.

Mrs. Martin

CORNER SCRAP-BOOK.

Rabbit-Driving in California. Allusion has recently been made in the Scrap-book to an "Anti-Squirrel Convention" in the State of Washington. The Boston Transcript gives a long account of an anti-rabbit convention held in Central California, which was very successful—from the standpoint of the antis, if not from that of the rabbits. The rabbits convened in San Joaquin Valley, for the purpose of eating the green grass and the bark of the vines and young fruit trees. Then, on a given day, the people convened—all sorts and conditions of men and women, in carriages, on horseback, children in big wagons, aggrieved farmers on foot. At the signal of a cannon the "drive" proper began, a skirmish line stretching six miles across the prairie. After a few hours the pursuers, many hundreds of them, were moving in a great circle, nclosing the rabbits. Gradually the lines of this living wall draw together. All is excitement. Horsemen are dashing hither and thither directing the chase; the boys shout, the ladies "shoo" as the frightened animals try to get past the line. At length the rabbits begin to run in concentric circles and with great rapidity till their movement is like a whirlwind. The drive ends in a wire pen, where the poor jack rabbits are slaughtered—twelve thousand of them on that particular day. The Rabbit Drivers' Association in charge cut off their ears, as vouchers for the bounty of one and one-half cents a rabbit paid by the county. Does this seem cruel? It is a necessary act of self-preservation on the part of the vineyard owners and fruit raisers. Either they must give up their business, or jack-rabbit must give up his.

Are Our Ladies Cruel? Not in hunting rabbits, but in being party to the killing of innocent and handsome birds, simply that they may transpose the bird's plumage to their own bonnets. The Massachusetts Audubon Society appeals to women to pledge themselves not to wear the feathers of wild birds for ornamentation, and invites membership through Miss Harriet E. Richards of the Boston Society of Natural History. The snowy heron of the North American coast is now nearly exterminated by the plume-hunters, for the plumes which they seek are worn only in the nesting season, while the parent bird is hatching or rearing its young, so that the whole family is usually destroyed. If ladies must imitate the savages in wearing the plumage of animals, why do they not confine their selection to the feathers of ostriches and other domesticated birds, which are not injured by the loss? The Animal World (London) says: "If ladies would only take to killing their pet canaries, bullfinches, skylarks, or even parrots, and exhibit them on their hats or bonnets, it might kill the fashion of slaughtering pretty birds for the sake of personal ornamentation."

Cruelty to a Boy? The boy got a sliver in his foot. The mother proposed a poultice. The boy declared that he wouldn't have a poultice. "Yes, you will have a poultice," said mother and grandmother. They were in the majority. The boy was put to bed. While grandmother applied the poultice, mother stood by with uplifted stick, threatening to use it if he opened his mouth. He did open it when the hot poultice touched his foot: "You"—"You keep still!" said the woman with the stick. Once more he tried: "I"—the stick waved, the operation was finished, and the boy tucked into bed. "Now Eddie's foot will be all well!" But as mother, grandmother and stick moved away, a shrill voice piped triumphantly from under the bedclothes: "You've got the poultice on the wrong foot!"

LESSON FOR MAY 17. Luke 19: 11-27.

THE PARABLE OF THE POUNDS.

BY REV. A. E. DUNNING, D. D.

Our Lord was on his last journey to Jerusalem. He had just a few days before taught his disciples that it was easier for a camel to go through the eye of a needle than for a rich man to enter into the kingdom of God. Then he had sought entertainment from a rich man, who took him not only into his house but also into his heart; and Jesus had declared that that rich man was fitted for the kingdom of God. Then, because they thought that the kingdom was to be at once set up, he spoke to them this parable of the pounds to show them that their entrance into the kingdom would depend, not on the amount of their possessions, but on the use they made of what they had.

Some thirty years before, Archelaus, son of Herod the Great, had gone to Rome to receive as his kingdom the territory where Jesus then was. But the people sent a large embassy after him to ask the Emperor Augustus not to permit him to reign over them. Augustus so far heeded their request as to reduce the territory which Archelaus expected to get and to give him the title of ethnarch instead of king. When he came back he caused many of those who had opposed him to be put to death.

The splendid palace which Herod had built was still standing in Jericho, reminding the people of these well-known facts. Jesus appears to have made them the basis of his parable. The kingdom of God, which the disciples expected would soon take the place of the Roman Government, was not what they supposed it to be. Jesus was its king, but he was on the eve of withdrawing from them, and their relation to his kingdom would depend on their faithfulness to his business during his absence. He did not tell them when he would return, but he did assure them that the time would surely come when he would reckon with them and would reward every one according to his works. He drew a picture for them of that reckoning and its consequences. These were twofold:

I. Rewards for faithful use of trusts. Each servant is represented as having the same trust committed to him, but the uses made of it differed with different men. Every one, then, is to be judged by the use which he makes of himself as a servant of God. If he fulfills God's purposes in his life he will have:

1. The divine approval. "Well done, thou good servant," from God are the most welcome words that can ever fall on the ears of his children. That they may be heard in the great day of final account, it is necessary that they should be found appropriate to the close of every day. They are to be spoken at last because of the faithful fulfillment of the charge, "Trade ye herewith till I come." That means, Do business for God till the time for doing business ends. The merchant, it may be, balances his books only at the close of the year. But if his heart is in his business he has a pretty accurate knowledge of its condition day by day. If he is prosperous he is conscious of it, and if he is losing ground he will not long be unaware of it. God's servants usually know how their business for him is going; and if they are prospering, the joy of it is realized day by day.

The nature of that business need not be misunderstood by any. It is witnessing to the experience of Christ's deliverance from sin and to God's mercy for the repentant sinner. It is seeking, in his name, the highest welfare of others, and thus advancing his kingdom. It is showing the spirit of him who pleased not himself. It is planting homes, if the opportunity is offered to us, and rearing children to serve God. It is fulfilling our duties as Christian citizens, and doing whatever will promote righteousness and extend the knowledge of truth in obedience to his will. The consciousness of doing these things to the best of our ability is the highest reward men can have in this life, and will be the abiding joy in remembrance throughout the everlasting life beyond the grave.

2. Enlarged possessions. The pound gained as the man did business with it. His capacity also grew with experience. When the hour of reckoning came, he was not only able to return to his master a large increase, but he was himself of far more value and was able to take much larger responsibilities, which were promptly given to him. One man was made ruler over ten cities, another over five. This does not imply that one was more faithful than the other and therefore received more cities. Each did according to his ability and was rewarded with as great responsibilities as he could receive. It is to be presumed that the man who was set over five cities was as content with his allotment as the one who was given authority over ten cities.

Faithfulness in doing business for God increases manhood. Strength to resist temptation grows, judgment becomes clearer, powers of leadership develop, reverence for men's possibilities deepens, in the conscientious discharge of duty with habitual seeking of guidance from God. Whenever we do anything for him, and for men in his name, we are enriched with more manhood, and this becomes our possession for eternity.

II. The punishment for unfaithfulness. One man to whom a pound was intrusted put it carefully away. He returned it just as he found it, and declared that he was afraid to do business with it lest he should lose it and incur his master's displeasure. By keeping the pound as it was he claimed that he had done his duty. But he ignored the fact that not only the pound but himself belonged to that master, and that, when the pound and the man came together, it was his fault if both did not gain in value. The punishment for his failure to improve his opportunities was:

1. Loss of the knowledge of God. The man who refuses filial relations with God thinks him a hard taskmaster. He forgets what he owes to him, and ascribes God's interest in him to selfishness. He thinks God is seeking what he has no right to in demanding his services. He admits that God has some claims on him, but when he has renounced his place as a child, whose highest privilege is obedience, he loses the conception of God which makes religious life tolerable. He looks upward only to make a bargain with God. The sinner who has lost the knowledge of what grace is, as favor to the undeserving, has lost the power of interpreting the character of God.

2. Loss of power and influence. The pound is ours only to be used for God. All our possessions and attainments we hold in trust. They become useless to us by disuse. No sadder truth than this is connected with human history. Every one who has reached middle life has seen illustrations of men and women with fair abilities and good prospects who have come to nothing, so far as helpful influence over others is concerned, simply because they have permitted their talents and opportunities to go to waste.

The neglected possessions and privileges of the unfaithful servant go to strengthen the power for good of the faithful. The law of life is that nothing which God intrusts to us, if faithfully used, can ever be wasted. Deafness or blindness or sickness have come to some who have gained education at great cost, and their usefulness seems to be cut off. But there are other fields for them, if not in this world in the next. The great truth of this lesson is an exhortation—Live for God, and you will live with him and will come to live like him.

PROGRESS OF THE KINGDOM.

COMBATING PAGANISM IN THE UNITED STATES.

(Parallel with The Congregationalist's June Topic for Missionary Meetings.)

The C. S. S. and P. S. lays the foundations of Christian work in many destitute communities, the C. E. S. helps to educate the minister, but it is the Congregational Home Missionary Society which undertakes his support, organizes churches in the West, North and South and aids feeble congregations in the East. When in 1826, under the name of the American Home Missionary Society, a national organization uniting several local home missionary societies was formed, it was designed especially to provide gospel privileges for the new settlements on the Northern and Western frontiers, and the society's best known and most interesting work is that among the hardy pioneers in the mining and lumber camps or in the agricultural regions of the West and Northwest.

Those who have read Mr. Puddefoot's book, The Minute Man on the Frontier, have some conception of the awful paganism and wickedness our home missionaries must fight against in these frontier towns, where they find "twenty saloons in a block, opera house and electric plants, dog fights, men fights, no Sabbath, but an extra day for amusements and debauchery." The people have but one aim—to make money. The pioneer preacher has neither church, parsonage nor a membership to start with. On the contrary, he often meets with hatred and opposition, sectarian jealousies are not uncommon and it is a long, weary way to the well-filled church, the thriving Sunday school and the cozy parsonage. But he perseveres in preaching the gospel in season and out of season, in winning the hearts of the younger generation, in visiting the sick and burying the dead until at last he succeeds in making the church a power in the community which in due time ceases to be a little frontier village and becomes a prosperous Western city. No other witness to the success of our home missionaries is needed than the fact that of the nearly 5,300 Congregational churches reported in 1895 more than five-sixths were planted, and many more were fostered, by the C. H. M. S. and its State auxiliaries.

Of course our frontiers are continually changing. Within the memory of the present generation Iowa, Illinois, Michigan, as well as other neighboring States, and more recently North and South Dakota, were regarded as new lands in the extreme West. At present interest centers in our latest frontier, the portion of the Indian Territory now called Oklahoma. It is unnecessary to describe here the mad rush for sections when in 1889 this territory was opened to the public, for every one will recall the exciting accounts in the daily papers at the time. It is of importance, however, to note how closely the home missionary, realizing that the longer a community is left without the gospel the harder it is to gain a footing, followed upon the heels of the immigrant. In the racy words of Brother Puddefoot: "Many of our minutemen preached the first Sunday. They were among those who sat on the cow-catcher of the engine and made the run for a church lot and to win souls. They preached that first Sunday in a dust storm so bad that you could scarcely see the color of your clothes." As a result Superintendent Parker declares that Congregationalism has never had a better opportunity nor a more urgent popular demand to take a controlling place in a commonwealth than it has at present in Oklahoma. In 1895 seventy-five church organizations were reported and at least twenty-five more appointments were filled by our missionaries. A band of six young men will enter this field after graduating from Chicago Seminary, and much interest is being awakened by Miss M. D. Moffat, a bright, winning young missionary who has recently been welcomed to Oklahoma by lonely women and rough cowboys alike.

It might be inferred that as the new portions of our land became civilized and in a measure evangelized that the call for help from the C. H. M. S. would be less urgent. On the contrary, the need for the expansion of this work is increased, owing to the rapid changes and the enormous increase in the population, the influx of foreigners and the steady and alarming decline in the quality of immigration. No feature of the society's work is more important than its efforts to meet and control this incoming tide of ignorance, barbarism and crime. We have at our very doors, in New England, with its million and a half of French-Canadians, no less than in the West, a vast foreign missionary work which must be pushed from patriotic as well as religious motives. The C. H. M. S. has now over 225 missionaries who preach the gospel in their own tongues to Bohemians, Poles, Slovaks, Germans, Scandinavians, Welsh, French-Canadians and Spanish-Americans, and it has been demonstrated that Christianity is the strongest power in transforming these alien people into intelligent and desirable American citizens.

We naturally think of the West and South as home missionary fields, and it is something of a surprise to learn that the C. H. M. S. supported as many as 484 missionaries in New England last year. Some of these men are engaged in work among the foreigners in the cities and large manufacturing towns, but many others are endeavoring to perpetuate or revive the village church in the deserted communities in the East. The best elements of the social, political and religious life of our cities come from these country towns, and, therefore, for the sake of what they have done and are still capable of doing for the preservation of American principles and a wholesome, religious atmosphere these old churches must be sustained. Moreover, there is in Maine another phase of missionary activity in the form of pioneer work in the back woods and among the growing lumber manufacturing villages.

Let us consider for a moment, now, this practical question: What is the wisest way of helping the home missionary? First, by helping him to help himself, or in other words by paying his salary fully and promptly, and this means steady loyalty to and ample support of the Home Missionary Society. If instead of sending second-hand clothing and ancient literature to our workers on the field, many of whom are as refined and cultured as their benefactors, our churches would make it possible for the C. H. M. S. to pay them promptly the money which is their due both the missionaries and the Christian at home would be greatly helped. Of course there may be circumstances which make it wise and desirable to send missionary barrels filled with excellent and useful articles, but as these good things are not always fairly distributed among the needy men charges of favoritism may sometimes be brought and jealousy and hard feeling be engendered. Another practical way of aiding home missionaries and their families is to send them good, fresh reading matter which shall help to reconcile them to the loss of libraries and stimulating intercourse with educated minds.

PRAYER MEETING.

BY REV. ISAAC OGDEN RANKIN.

Topic, May 17–23. How God Rewards Those That Do His Will. Matt. 25: 31–46.

We live from day to day like men whose homes are at the bottom of a narrow mountain valley over the mountain wall of which they cannot look, but God sees all—the end from the beginning, the fruit in the flower, the reward of the faithful, the loss of all who live for the earth alone. Those who had done his will in mercy to others were not merely to have a kingdom, but to inherit it, and not any kingdom which might happen to be ready, but the kingdom prepared for them from the beginning of the world.

Take the thought in this order. God is preparing us for responsibility and dignity. That is the end toward which every day's march brings the Christian nearer. There is a kingdom looming up at the end of our life. Now in order to prepare us for great things he must practice us in smaller things. We are not to shirk responsibility, because if we do we shall not be fit for our opportunity when it comes.

God is preparing a kingdom for us. There is a great work going on outside this life in which we work, and going on on our account. Our characters and God's preparation are to dovetail into each other when the end comes as the two halves of a broken coin fit when they are brought together. The larger, purer, more obedient the character the greater the dignity and responsibility will be.

There is nothing arbitrary in this judgment. What the people on the right hand did, and the people on the left hand failed to do, was not something outside of themselves. It was the expression of themselves. They did what they wished to do quite simply, and their wishes showed what they were.

God rewards faithfulness in responsibility with more responsibility. We grow strong, but not for idleness. It will be well for us to think of this, and, while we think of it, to remember that he always gives us power to do our work. When we become kings we shall have a king's strength for the kingdom.

DR. ALDEN'S LAST WORD.

Probably if the late Dr. E. K. Alden had attempted to leave a single last word to his friends, especially those who knew him best, more characteristic of his whole nature, none would have better expressed the man than the following remark which he made to a namesake on the day he was last down town. After speaking of his recent illness and apparent improvement in health, and of his purpose to soon take his wife and together go to the country for rest, his friend reminded him that he came of strong, long-lived stock and would come out all right. Dr. Alden remarked, "Yes, strong physically and strong in the faith." That remark was an open index to the man. He was of strong Pilgrim stock physically, and, like the Pilgrims, he had the strength of his conviction. May the living descendants of Pilgrim John Alden and Priscilla, his wife, not forget their heritage. EDWARD ALDEN.

BOOK REVIEWS.

HISTORY OF CHRISTIAN DOCTRINE.

Professor Fisher's History of Christian Doctrine, in the International Theological Library, is a well-printed book of nearly 600 pages in clear type and pleasant to the eyes. Of these pages twenty-four are given to the very complete and satisfactory index, a fact which may suggest to our readers the greatness of the mass of material which it was necessary to sift and put in order before the book was complete. Every such book, indeed, seems like a house carved out of a mountain, the rejected and discarded material is so much greater than that which is taken for use.

It is difficult to characterize briefly so learned and comprehensive a book as this. First of all, it bears traces of the work of a lifetime. We have used the figure of building, but one feels that it is something which has grown rather than been built, and that behind it as determining factors are the long and honored years of study and of teaching. Yet, on the other hand, the book is not a mere careful reprint of lectures delivered to the students of Yale. A different arrangement and order of presentation has been chosen, and while this involved the entire recasting of the materials incorporated, it insured also a fresh study of their relations and of the best method of presentation, which has imparted unity and freshness to the whole.

Professor Fisher takes his subject in its largest meaning, interpreting it as including the more pregnant and vital conclusions of individual thought as well as the official utterances of the church through councils or through creeds. While this adds very much to the scope and difficulty of his task, it adds more to its attractiveness and to the comprehensive value of the result. It enables him, for example, to trace the tendencies and variations of modern thought both in Europe and America down to the time of writing, and the summaries of this recent philosophical and theological growth will be of great value to the student who has not at hand the library of reference in several tongues which would be needed to work out these facts and their relations for himself.

There is no concealment or minimizing of the author's beliefs or ecclesiastical position, but the reader feels from the first that he is in the care of a clear-seeing, fair and truth-loving guide, and never more than in the presence of the burning questions of the modern time. Grasp of the whole situation, swift seizing of the central thought in its concisest expression and a power of setting it before us in its relations so that we cannot help understanding what it is, and how it came to be and what it stands for—these are qualities which the book displays from first to last. If its style never rises to hights of picturesque and poetic diction, it is always luminous and distinct, and its cool evenness of texture is only the correlate of an impartial study of all the facts. Altogether the book fulfills its own declared purpose—"to present in an objective way and in an impartial spirit the course of theological thought respecting the religion of the gospel." We cannot recommend it for light reading, but any one who will take the pains to study it carefully will find himself in possession of the essential facts of theological evolution and, better still, of those facts in their clear order and relations. [Charles Scribner's Sons. $2.50 net.]

SCIENCE AND RELIGION.

President Schurman of Cornell has given us a valuable and suggestive book in his Agnosticism and Religion. It consists of three papers on Huxley and Scientific Agnosticism, Philosophical Agnosticism, and Spiritual Religion: Its Evolution and Essence.

Of these the first was delivered before the students of the university on a Sunday evening and is destructive in its first purpose, aiming to clear the way for the constructive processes of modern philosophical teaching. It is a discriminating review of Professor Huxley's life and work, of the clearness and honesty of thought to which he called the age, and of the limitations of his own thought and teaching.

In the second paper the nature and bounds of knowledge are considered, and the supersensuous attainments of the spirit insisted on; and in the third the necessity and validity of religion and of Christianity are shown.

The author's style is clear and he is often very happy in his way of stating his thought so that it stands out vividly and produces the effect he intends. The book will be especially helpful to young men in their experience of uncertainty in modern teaching changes. It is, indeed, rather the ladder out of the pit of doubt for those who are in it, than a book of help for established faith. It calls for strenuous thought and life, and would have us rejoice that the church is "the plastic organization of a life which is spiritual." To the student of the modern revolt against a materialistic science and the arrival from scientific quarters of a mediating philosophy which admits the validity of Christian thought the book is especially valuable and suggestive. [Charles Scribner's Sons. $1.00.]

Another book called out by the prevalent theories of Biblical interpretation is Eden Lost and Won, by Sir J. William Dawson, LL. D. Professor Dawson comes to the study of the earlier Hebrew records with the equipment of a geologist and the added experience of long study and championship of the traditional view of the origin and time of writing of the Pentateuch. He has availed himself of the suggestions of modern archæology, and succeeds in making a strong case—so strong as to show that the higher criticism of the Pentateuch is not yet fully worked out to an enduring conclusion. The last word of archæology has certainly not been said, as is proved by a discovery of Professor Petrie's in Egypt, referred to in our Literary Notes last week. It is significant that Professor Dawson wholly abandons the theory of the universality of the deluge, and at other points makes concessions which involve the absence of exact and detailed historical and physical information on the face of the Old Testament narrative, and, this being granted, the way is open for cool and single-minded investigation of all the questions involved. We agree with him in thinking that the points of meeting between the Genesis narrative and the conclusions thus far reached from the deciphered history of the earth's crust are far more wonderful than the divergencies, so many and so wonderful, indeed, that they constitute quite the most marvelous record of coincidence in literary history, if they stand for nothing more. But the moral worth of the history, we believe, will be quite untouched, whatever conclusions may be reached by criticism. [Fleming H. Revell Co. $1 25.]

Evolution and Dogma, by Rev. J. A. Zahm, professor of physics in the University of Notre Dame. The second part of this book consists of lectures delivered before summer and winter schools, and may be classed as part of that university extension work which fills so large a place in our modern educational life. The whole book is a study of the modern evolutionary philosophy from the Roman Catholic point of view, and is of great interest in its definition of the extent of concession and limits of belief in that denomination. Many of those who have only superficially studied the tendencies of recent Roman Catholic thought will be surprised to find how far Professor Zahm thinks himself allowed to go in the direction of an acceptance of modern scientific conclusions in regard to the development of man's body. Nevertheless, he insists, "Evolution is not a theory of creation or cause, but one of order or method; a modus creandi which the deity was pleased to adopt. Of the origin of matter, of life, of spirit, science as such can give us no information." The recent transfer of Professor Zahm to a place near the person of the present pope seems like an indorsement of his tendencies and views. [D. H. McBride & Co. $2.00.]

The Religion of Science, by Dr. Paul Carus, second edition, revised and enlarged. We come to the review of this book with a strange mixture of sensations. In the first place it is a sign of the times, a witness to a scientific reaction from the bald materialism which was so common among specialists and the half-educated a few years ago. It is a distinctly reverent, though not always discriminating and clear-seeing, or polite and charitable, book. But we can hardly think the author cares very much for our opinion after reading what he says about "Name-Christians," among whom he certainly would include us, and of whom he says: "The so-called faithful Christians have made themselves a religion little better than that of fetish worshipers, and practice in many respects an ethics exactly opposite to the injunctions of Christ. . . . They believe in the letter of mythological traditions and fail to recognize the spirit of the truth." Dr. Carus's book may help some who are caught in the despair of materialistic doubt up to a freer air, but for one whose thought of God is that of acquaintance founded upon long experience it can only lead down into the fog of uncertainty. There is no religion of science—for God is not known by sense-perception, which is the only instrument of search which science employs—but there is a science of religion in which the phenomena of faith may be observed, co-ordinated and compared, and the material for this exists in unnoticed abundance in the world. [Open Court Publishing Co. 50 cents.]

RELIGIOUS.

The Master's Indwelling, by Rev. Andrew Murray. These addresses were given at the Northfield Conference of 1895, but have been rewritten and revised by the author for this edition. They are exceedingly suggestive in their teaching about the Christian life. They are deep yet lucid, broad yet Scriptural, fervent yet philosophical, and they emphasize the experimental knowledge of God. The author makes us feel that there was a deep significance in the quoted prayer of the title-page: "That Christ may dwell in your hearts by faith." [Fleming H. Revell Co. 75 cents.]

The Spirit-Filled Life, by Rev. John MacNeil, with introduction by Rev. Andrew Murray. Mr. MacNeil is a world-wide evangelist, as the Australian and American introductions to a Scotchman's book bear witness. "I have written only for 'babes,'" says the author in his preface. It is simple, pungent and withal imaginative preaching which is here illustrated, not always in perfect taste in choice of words or illustrations, but always thoroughly in earnest. [Fleming H. Revell Co. 75 cents.]

He Suffered, or Human Suffering Interpreted by Jesus Christ. From the French of Wilfred Monod by Annie D. Perkins. This is a little book of meditations for Holy Week, the result, the author tells us, of a conversation with one who was ill, body and soul. In the growth of its thought the inevitable necessity of suffering grows to its glory and mystery—a mystery in which we are partakers of the life of Christ on earth. [Thomas Whittaker. 60 cents.]

Beauty for Ashes is a little book of selections of both prose and verse for comfort of the sorrowful by Rev. William C. Wilbor. The new and the old are mingled and it will, no doubt, assist some whose affliction has reached the stage where suggestions from the mind of others may bring help. [Hunt & Eaton. 35 cents.]

Last Words for My Young Readers and Hearers, by B. B. Comegys, is a compilation of religious addresses given to congregations of boys in the chapel of Girard College and to the youthful inmates of the House of Refuge in Philadelphia. The twenty-four chapters deal with practical problems of everyday life, are embellished with pertinent illustrations suited to the varying ages of those addressed, and close, in most cases, with an effective appeal to the individual conscience. [F. H. Revell Co. $1.00.]

STORIES.

A Woman Intervenes is an appropriate title for Robert Barr's spirited and entertaining story, in which a frank, sensible young English heiress comes to the rescue at various critical junctures in the fortunes of the two heroes, and a bright American girl plays a prominent part. The latter is too unconventional to be a fair type of American womanhood, but she is nevertheless a fascinating little person, and her boldness may be attributed to the fact that she is an enterprising journalist of the unscrupulous modern school. The story centers around a mining speculation, giving opportunity for dramatic situations, rendered thrilling by woman's love and man's duplicity, and the reader's interest is kept at high pitch from beginning to end. [Frederick A. Stokes Co. $1.25.]

Dr. Congalton's Legacy, by Henry Johnston, is distinctly a descendant of A Window in Thrums and akin to the several members of that interesting family. Not that it has no individuality, but on taking it up one has a feeling of auld acquaintance in the scenes and characters. Said "legacy" restricts the doctor's brother in the matter of marriage and several lives are involved, but each person marries his or her own choice in the end, obstacles being removed in a not wholly novel but satisfactory fashion, and matters are arranged for the happiness of all concerned. There are charming bits of description throughout the book, the whole forming a readable and interesting volume. [Charles Scribner's Sons. $1.25.]

The Apotheosis of Mr. Tyrawley, by E. Livingston Prescott, records the growth in grace of the hero on insufficient grounds, when one considers how heavily he was overweighted by heredity, environment, etc. A pronounced chevalier d'industrie, he saves the life of a boy and his sister, and one glance of her lovely eyes seems to set in motion reforming agencies that work effectually and with astonishing quickness towards complete moral regeneration. The book is wholesome, however, and may prove an incentive to other aspirants for apotheosis. One can always bear in mind, "It is the unexpected that happens." [Harper & Brothers. $1.25.]

Dedora Heywood, by Gertrude Smith, is a volume of the Feather Library. The story recounts the mental experience of its heroine in leaving her home, and therefore her church, for six months, changing in the interval her views of life and religion. As her newly found opinions conflict with the doctrines of her "society," she undergoes finally expulsion from said body. Having been greatly helped by her new faith, she is enabled to bear this and another greater trial with a brave heart.

Another number of the same library is In a Silent World, an attractive title for a commonplace book. The fact that the heroine is deaf and dumb forms its only novelty and gives the book its name. There are incidents meant to be exciting but falling somewhat short, and the suspicion of "bookmaking" is too much forced upon the reader throughout. [Dodd, Mead & Co. Each 75 cents.]

MISCELLANEOUS.

Missionary enterprise in the Orient owes much of its success to the tact, the faith, the energy of consecrated women. In Missionary Heroines in Eastern Lands, Mrs. E. R. Pitman has gathered together brief biographical sketches of four interesting women—Mrs. Alexina Mackay Ruthquist and Dr. Mary McGeorge, whose work was principally among the zenanas of India, Mrs. Bowen Thompson, who devoted her life to the education of women in Syria, and Mary Louise Whately, the pioneer worker among Moslem women and children in Egypt. The book is peculiarly a record of women's work for women. [Fleming H. Revell Co. 75 cents.]

We have three useful little hand-books upon Christian Endeavor activities, all of them by Amos R. Wells, the managing editor of the Golden Rule. The first is Prayer Meeting Methods. The style is crisp, incisive, often epigrammatic, perhaps a trifle abrupt at times, and the matter exceedingly suggestive and practical. It would be helpful to the older Christians as well.——Another is Our Unions, a manual of methods for local, county, district and State Christian Endeavor unions. This is helpful, full of businesslike and sensible suggestions as to the organization and conduct of co-operative Christian Endeavor work and will be very useful for its declared purpose.——A third is Social to Save and is devoted to suggestions for the social committees of the Endeavor Societies and for the home circle. The first part discusses the uses and methods of sociability, insisting upon its advantages for witness bearing, and the second gives descriptions of plans and games for practical use in great variety. [United Society of Christian Endeavor. 50, 35 and 35 cents.]

Significant of the change in taste from the introspective psychological novels of a few years ago is the revival of popular interest in the books of George Borrow. We have recently referred to a republication of Larengro, and now have before us a new illustrated edition of The Bible in Spain, with notes and a glossary by Ulick R. Burke. Certainly no benevolent society ever had a more interesting agent and colporteur than the British and Foreign Bible Society secured when it sent Borrow into Spain after the Carlist wars. He is the prince of vagabonds, as well as the most courageous of propagandists. "In Spain," he says, "I passed five years, which, if not the most eventful, were, I have no hesitation in saying, the most happy years of my existence." Without the literary gift these happy years would have been lost to the world, but Borrow possessed this in a high degree, and we are enabled to share his pleasure in extracting the delights of adventure from whatever surroundings happened to his lot. Those who cannot agree with his opinions will, nevertheless, find him a most agreeable companion. The book is clearly printed and well indexed, and the editor's introduction covers the historical ground sufficiently. Some biographical and critical account of Borrow would have added to the interest of the book. [G. P. Putnam's Sons. 2 vols. $4.00.]

An American edition of Wilfred T. Grenfell's Vikings of Today, reviewed in our issue of Jan. 30, has been published by the Fleming H. Revell Co. [$1 25.]

NOTES.

—— The latest number of Mr. Stead's series of Penny Novels is Jane Eyre.

—— Prof. Katherine Lee Bates of Wellesley College has written a History of American Literature which will soon be published by Macmillan & Co.

—— A statue of Washington by Daniel C. French is soon to be erected in the Rue Washington, Paris, as the gift of an association of American women.

—— Professor Drummond's illness continues to be a source of anxiety to his friends. He seems never to have recovered from the hard work of publishing his last book.

—— Dr. Ludlow's story, The Baritone's Parish, which our readers recently enjoyed as a serial, has now been issued in book form by the Fleming H. Revell Co.

—— Mr. R. H. Stoddard, says the Critic, who some years ago successfully underwent an operation for cataract, has again been operated upon with equally favorable results.

—— The weekly output of Bibles from the Oxford Press in England is said to be about 20,000. It takes the skins of 70,000 animals to bind them, and 400,000 sheets of gold leaf are used for lettering the titles on the backs.

—— In the break up of the Chicago publishing firm of Stone & Kimball the copyrights of Stevenson's works held by them was sold to the Scribners, who are now the authorized publishers for America of all Stevenson's books. The Chap Book will, after all, remain in Chicago.

—— Andrew Carnegie offers through the trustees of the Carnegie Art Gallery at Pittsburg prizes of $5,000 and $3,000 for the best two oil paintings by American artists, the pictures to become the property of the museum at the close of an exhibition to be held next November.

—— The public is likely to get more from the British Egyptian campaign than usual in the way of literary enjoyment, if nothing serious happens to Dr. Conan Doyle, army surgeon and novelist, who has been sent out as special correspondent by a syndicate of English and American newspapers.

—— The Outlook is to publish a popular Life of Gladstone by Justin McCarthy. As historian of Our Own Times, novelist and political leader of the Home Rulers, for whose demands Gladstone made such great personal sacrifices, Mr. McCarthy is peculiarly fitted for the task which he has undertaken and the work will be looked forward to with great interest. The Outlook has arranged for its profuse illustration with material gathered from many sources.

PROF. GEORGE ADAM SMITH ON HEBREW POETRY.

The people of Baltimore are greatly favored in the way of hearing eminent lecturers. By the liberal policy of the Johns Hopkins University, under the lead of its genial president, all lectures in the university likely to be of general interest are freely opened to the public. The lectureship in connection with which Professor Smith is here—the Percy Turnbull Memorial Lectureship of Poetry, founded by Mr. and Mrs. Lawrence Turnbull of Baltimore in remembrance of a deceased son—is an illustration, and one of the fruits, of the kind feeling which exists between "town and gown"

The lecturer, Rev. George Adam Smith, D. D., LL D., professor of Hebrew and Old Testament exegesis in the Free Church College, Glasgow, Scotland, is peculiarly well equipped for his service. Besides a scholarly acquaintance with Hebrew literature, he was born in the East, being a son of Dr. George Smith, a prominent missionary of the Free Church of Scotland in Calcutta, thus by the atmosphere of his childhood obtaining an ability to understand Oriental ways of thinking. Moreover he has a personal acquaintance with Palestine and its life such as few possess by repeated visits and special study of the country. But beyond all these he was by nature endowed with the soul of a poet, quick of insight, sympathetic in feeling, lofty in thought, by which he is able to interpret poetry come from what quarter it may. His diction also is as beautiful as his thoughts, natural, simple, perspicuous, flowing.

The lecturer looks to be about forty years old, a man of medium size, compactly built, with a complexion indicating ruddy health and manly vigor. His movements are somewhat angular and he speaks with a marked Scotch accent and modulation, but as he himself is unconscious of these, and evidently would care little for them if he were, neither do his audiences care. His honest blue eyes and manly face beam with kindness as well as glow with interest in his theme. One finds him just the same also away from the rostrum as upon it, extremely affable and easily approached by all. He is altogether such a man as people like to come near.

In our spiritual relations health is contagious. And in this fact is found one chief element of Professor Smith's popularity and attractiveness—every one who comes in contact with him feels himself the stronger by it. People surrender themselves to him in weakness, perplexity and doubt, and come away from his lecture invigorated in mind and courage and faith. The intellectual enjoyment of his subtle, original thought is great, but the spiritual enjoyment is even greater.

This feeling is shared in by all notwithstanding his pronounced approval of the methods and concurrence in the general results of the modern higher criticism. He does not hesitate to speak of the early chapters of Genesis as, in essential qualities, an epic, nor of the account of our first parents' sin as "the prose poem of the fall," nor to comment on the intellectual and spiritual attainments of a nation "which could produce such a poem at so early a date as 750 B. C."; and yet he seems to give no offense even to the most conservative. The audiences, large at first, steadily increased until they reached the full capacity of the great hall of the university where the lectures were held, and it was impossible not to catch the contagion of eagerness in listening and of the universal gladness and satisfaction as the people passed out after each lecture. The wife of a very stanch and orthodox clergyman who, with her husband, has been prominent in attendance through the whole course was heard to say, "I do not believe as he does, but he is very interesting."

Another charm of these lectures has been that the speaker is not at all ashamed to let one see his own heart. Among the most memorable passages are those which brought his own innermost experiences to the illustration of his themes. For example, one day he told of the moment when first there came to his soul the imagination of vastness and breadth. He was a little child, in the church, shut out from all sights by the high walls of the deep, square pew. Suddenly he was roused from a reverie by the minister's voice reading from Isaiah: "He shall dwell on high: his place of defense shall be the munitions of rocks. Thine eyes shall see the king in his beauty: they shall behold the land that is very far off." In that moment was born in him the poetic conception of space. And thus single texts from the Hebrew poets used to relieve for him "dreary unintelligible chapters," reminding him of one of the pleasures of his childhood—the climbing up the dark stairways of a ruined castle near where he lived and obtaining glorious, far-spreading visions through the loopholes.

One of the most touching passages was where he interpreted the patriotic poetry of Israel's exile by the homesick feelings of his Scotch countrymen, equally exiled—though for different reasons—from the land they love. Thus the charm of the lectures, even more than in the wealth of information they abounded with—ethnological, historical, theological—lay in the humanly sympathetic interpretation of the poetry as such.

The lectures were eight in number. The first traced the characteristics of Hebrew poetry to the general characteristics of the Hebrew race, and these chiefly to the never effaced effects of their desert origin and discipline. The Hebrew poet, unlike the Aryan poet, was not a maker, but a seer. His gifts were perception and receptivity, rather than construction. He was a man with a message which he was urgently driven to deliver. The hero was himself his own poet. They had no art separate from experience.

The succeeding lectures treated of the conditions imposed by peculiarities of the language—that it lacks adaptation to rhyme and rhythm—and of the devices to supply the place of these, of their poetry of nature, of the early national poetry evolved in the making of Israel, of David and the Psalter, of the poetry of complaint and confession, of exile and death, in which Israel has become the whole world's "mother of sorrows," and, lastly, the poetry of wisdom.

All these were treated with most satisfactory thoroughness and with charming acuteness of observation and reflection. But, also, the lecturer never forgot his higher office of preacher, and manifestly won both the respect and affection of his audiences by his bold, honest, Christian exhortations to young men, to parents, to citizens, whenever his subjects brought occasion for them. Rev. Alexander McKenzie, D. D., President; George Gould, Treasurer.

PASSING COMMENT.

According to a New Jersey item, the monthly church social may be made much more effectual than ordinarily by a little extra attention.

Spring is the season of greatest growth in churches as in nature. The swelling of membership rolls and the threatened bursting of the walls of the meeting houses with large congregations are good signs, not lacking this year.

That little band of infant workers in a New England church seems to be founded upon a strong financial basis.

For stirring activities by an individual and a church we will do well to read the reports from a central Massachusetts city.

Those who have inquired frequently as to the extent to which individual cups have been adopted will be interested to know that nearly fifty of our churches use them.

THEOLOGICAL SEMINARIES.

Bangor.

Required work in the gymnasium under the efficient direction of Professor Gilmore ended April 30. Either class drill work or indoor base ball has been the rule four times a week for the past few months.——At the public examination, Commencement week, each member of the Senior Class will give a five-minute address on some topic connected with the work in homiletics, pastoral theology or sociology.——Professors Ropes and Denio have recently entertained the students in their annual receptions.

Andover.

President Smyth preached in the seminary church last Sunday.——George M. Ward of the Senior Class has accepted a call to the presidency of Rollins College and was ordained in Lowell last Monday. ——Mr. Georg Frèsè, instructor in vocal music, has gone to Europe on his wedding tour.——The Hyde lectures, given by Rev. Dr Henry Blodget, are held Tuesday, Wednesday and Thursday afternoons of this week in Bartlet Chapel.

Hartford.

At the general exercises Wednesday afternoon a review of Miss Scudder's The Life of the Spirit in the Modern English Poets was read and there was a helpful sermon by Mr. Merrill.——Last week Professor Gillett gave a delightful talk to the members of the Junior Class on Student Life in Germany. ——At the conclusion of Dr. Walker's last Carew lecture President Hartranft expressed, in a few graceful and earnest words, the thanks of the seminary for the course, which has been interesting and instructive.——Most of the Junior Class visited the Deaf and Dumb Asylum last week, with Professor Merriam.——The regular class work in the gymnasium is discontinued for the season.

Yale.

Last Saturday Dr. J. C. Griggs gave the closing lecture of his course in worship music, the subject being Choir Organization, the Pastor's Relation to Church Music. Illustrations were given by a quartet, a large chorus and soloists.——Special lectures last week were given on The Fall and Rise of the Scandinavian Peasantry by Prof. W. G. Sumner and on Independence in Politics by Prof. James Schouler of Boston.——At the meeting of the Philosophical Club Hon. W. T. Harris gave an address on Nationalization in Modern Systems of Education.——Papers were read before the class in systematic theology on White's Life in Christ and on Salmond's Christian Doctrine of Immortality.——Mr. A. T. Harrington of the Middle Class has been engaged by the society for work in Kansas.——R. H. Potter, a Junior, left last week for Nebraska to work under the H. M. S.——Mr. W. W. Wallace will supply the church at Bridgewater next year.——The Commencement exercises and the alumni meeting will be held on May 20.——Prof. Samuel Harris gave his last lecture in the school last week Tuesday.——J. H. Kimball has been obliged to give up his pastorate at Easton on account of ill health. A number of the Senior Class will remain with the Graduate Class next year.

Oberlin.

At the Cleveland Conference, April 15, approbation to preach was granted to Messrs. Clark, Grupe, Haskett, Hinman, Powell and Riggs of the classical course, and to Messrs. Brown, Leary, Miller, Smith and Torrens of the English course.

Chicago.

These students go to South Dakota for summer work: E. F. Lyman to Wheeler, R. B. Hall to Waubay, C. T. Halbert to Meckling and H. G. Adams to Garretson.

Woburn Conference was held in West Medford, April 28, every church being represented. Topics were: Christian Nurture, The Attitude of the Church in Smaller Places to the Y. M. C. A., Can the Church Supply the Demand of Men for Club and Fraternity Life?

Andover Conference at its annual meeting, April 28, in Tewksbury considered the topics: Congregationalism as a Denomination, As a Witness to the Truth, As a Power for Righteousness, Work of the Churches and Its Lessons, and the A. M. A. Dr. H. E. Barnes preached the sermon.

N. Y.—The Western New York Association met in Spencerport, April 28, 29. Dr. A. L. Smalley preached the sermon. Subjects were: Spiritual Growth of the Church, Our Foreign Population, The Ideal Sunday School Realized, The A. M. A. and Foreign Missions. The Woman's Missionary Union occupied an evening session.

O.—The Central Ohio Conference held its last meeting with the Eastwood Church, Columbus, and enjoyed a rich treat from a consideration of Denominational History and Life. The topics were: What Are the Marks of True Congregationalism? Congregationalism in Ohio, Congregationalism and Education, The Strength and Weakness of Congregationalism, Denominational Loyalty, Our Benevolent Societies. Dr. Leonard of Oberlin addressed the conference on The Ohio Centennial Celebration. Dr. Gladden gave an admirable closing lecture on Why I Am a Congregationalist.

Puritan Conference was held in Rootstown, April 28, 29. This being the centennial year of Ohio Congregationalism, considerable attention was given to the subject. The topics were: Congregationalism in Ohio, Congregationalism in Education and Evangelization, and Ministerial Standing. The sermon was preached by Rev. P. D. Dodge.

ILL.—The Southern Association met in Mill Creek April 21-23. The sermon was by Rev. A. S. Rogers. Topics were: Hints as to Improvement in Sunday School Work, Factors Essential to Organized Work, The Duty of the Home, the Community and the Church to the Child and Youth, The Responsibility of the Church to Create and Direct Public Opinion The Spiritual Culture of Our Church Members, To What Degree Shall the Membership of the Churches of the Southern Association be Instructed and Trained to Co-operate with Our General Benevolent Societies? The Southern Collegiate Institute, Church Life and Work, The Duty of the Church to Develop a Taste and to Cultivate a Desire for Good Reading Among the Young, and Our Benevolent Societies.

Springfield Association met in Springfield, April 28-30. The sermon was by Rev. Dr. J. B. Fairbank. Papers were on: Recent Attacks on Worth of Foreign Missions, The Emotional and Intellectual in Experimental Religion, The Office of Religious Education in the Formation of Character and Review of The Christ of Today. The Illinois H. M. U. occupied an hour and a half and the Y. P. S. C. E. an hour.

IO.—Four associational meetings were held, April 20-23—the Davenport at Clinton, the Council Bluffs at Oakland, the Denmark at South Ottumwa, and the Webster City at Eagle Grove. At each place all the missionary societies had a hearing, their work being presented by pastors and missionaries. At Oakland and South Ottumwa laymen had leading parts on the program.

The subjects discussed at Oakland were: Reverence in Worship, Present and Historic Standards of Church Doctrine and Life, and The Pulpit and Amusements. At South Ottumwa the topics were: Adaptation of Church Work to Changed Conditions, The Value of C. E. Methods in Developing Christian Character, Organization as a Factor in Church Life, Knowledge in the Use of Scripture, The Religious Newspaper, The Country Church, and a review of Harris's Moral Evolution. Themes considered at Eagle Grove were: Has the Bible Lost Its Hold on the People? Is There a Decay of Self-Sacrifice? How to Give and How Much to Give, What Is Christian Socialism? What Is Congregationalism? What Is the Church and Why Should Christians Unite with It? Christ in the Scriptures, in Literature, in History, and in Modern Preaching. Truths Needing Emphasis, Fellowship, A Higher Spiritual Life, and Crime were among the topics discussed at Clinton. Messrs. Harry Blunt of Iowa City and J. B. Gonzales of Cedar Rapids, after due examination, were approbated to preach. A noteworthy event was the reception into the Congregational fellowship of Rev. C. E. Perkins, a former Unitarian minister, now resident in Iowa City. His statement of belief was entirely satisfactory.

The Dubuque Association met at Cedar Falls, April 27-29, Dr. J. E. Roy of the A. M. A. opening the meeting with a stereopticon lecture. Other phases of home work were presented by Supt. C. A. Towle and Sec. T. O. Douglass, and Rev. H. G. Bissell of India spoke for the American Board. Rev. F. E. Hopkins preached the sermon. Topics were: Co-operation of Churches, Henry George's Theory of Taxation, Baptism of the Spirit, The Church as an Organization of Personal Workers, How to Get a Missionary Offering, A Growing Ministry and How to Know and Use the Word of God. Resolutions were passed expressing sympathy with and confidence in Dr. C. O. Brown of San Francisco, once a member of this body, and calling in question the action of the Bay Association in withdrawing fellowship from him.

At the meeting of Grinnell Association in Victor, April 28, 29, papers and discussions were on: Silent Preachers, or Religious Newspapers, Does Present Day Preaching Give Sufficient Prominence to the Doctrine of Future Retribution? and The Churches and the Christian College. Missionary addresses were made by Supt. C. A. Towle and Secretaries Douglass, Taintor and Herrick, the last named using a stereopticon. Rev. E. M. Vittum preached the sermon.

MO.—The St. Louis Association met at Maplewood, April 16. The leading addresses were on: Waste in Church Work, Lay Preaching, Conversion and Regeneration, and An Ideal Congregational Church.

KAN.—Northern Association met at Sabetha, April 14-16. Prof. L. E. Tupper preached the sermon. A particularly interesting exercise was an experience meeting, every minister stating Why I Am a Congregationalist. Addresses were made on Missionary Work in Africa, and Home Missionary Work in Oklahoma. Other themes were: World-wide Missions, The Work of a Church, The Relation of the Sunday School to the Church, and The Work of Evangelism in Kansas.

NEB.—The Frontier Association held its spring meeting at Curtis, April 21, 22, with unusually large attendance. Abundant rains had rejoiced all hearts. Every church but one in the Association was represented. Pastors and delegates brought news of revival work and ingatherings. Addresses were made on Christian Education and The Holy Spirit. There was a symposium on Christ's Ownership of the Individual, the Church, Business and the Nation. The W. H. M. U. and C. H. M. S. were ably represented, and a whole afternoon and evening were given to Sunday school work.

CLUBS.

MASS.—At the Connecticut Valley Club meeting, April 28, in Springfield, the subject was Electricity. Sub-topics were: The Possibilities of the X Rays, The Economic Side of Electricity and Its Development in Aiding the General State of Social Life, Street Railways and The Ethical Side of Electricity.

MINN —The Southern Minnesota Club entertained the Minnesota Club at Northfield, April 27. The subject was Christian Education in Minnesota. The clubs were the guests of Carleton College and the First Church of that city.

MO.—The Springfield Club met with the First Church, April 27. The subject was Congregationalism. Its weak points were set forth by Rev. A. J. Van Wagner of Carthage, its strong points by Hon. W. I. Wallace. Others participated in the discussion. The result was a new appreciation of the strength of our denomination and a clearer discernment of its weaknesses and how to remedy them.

NEW ENGLAND.

Boston.

Union.—Last Friday evening the resignation of Dr. Nehemiah Boynton was accepted and resolutions appreciative of his faithful service were passed. That the church reciprocates the love of the pastor for it is evident in the text of that expression.

The Superintendents' Union last Monday night was even better attended than usual, the occasion being a fellowship gathering, the first meeting of the kind ever held by the union. The general subject was: What Points Are You Specially Emphasizing? The answers were given by guests of the evening, representing the work as it is conducted in six denominations. The speakers were: Rev. E. A. Horton, Rev. C. A. Littlefield, Rev. W. L. Hooper, Mr. S. H. Dudley, Mr. R. G. Huling and Mr. John Gilchrist. In the interests of the great Sunday School Convention to be held in Boston next June, Mr. G. W. Coleman outlined the program and enthused the members with brief remarks.

Massachusetts.

CHELSEA.—Central. At the close of the prayer meeting last Friday night, the large congregation was made happy by the statement that the pastor, Rev. C. E. Jefferson, had decided not to accept his recent call to California. The enthusiastic congratulations of the pastor's friends were full of meaning to him and for the church.

MELROSE.—First. The resignation of Rev. A. G. Bale was accepted last week. About four months ago the pastor resigned, but the church, hoping for a withdrawal of the resignation, refused to accept his action. Mr. Bale has been pastor here for nearly 30 years—ever since his ordination.

NEWTON.—Auburndale. Two shares on the debt of the A. M. A. were collected at the missionary concert last Sunday evening.

HYDE PARK.—A large accession was received to the membership last Sunday, 45 persons being added, six on confession. This is partly the result of the evangelistic services conducted in the town not long ago by Evangelist C. L. Jackson. At the seventh annual cradle roll meeting nearly $100 were reported as the amount raised last week. During the seven years that Mrs. J. C. Bridgman has superintended this band of little folks it has raised about $1,100. At a recent meeting, after a discussion of plans for the provision of the enlarging work of the church, it was decided to appoint a committee for securing subscriptions. But the pastor at once began a canvass and secured pledges amounting to over $10,000, and a lot has been secured.

DEDHAM.—First. The church supper was attended by nearly 200 persons, 159 being members. The responses were many and encouraging and messages were received from many absent members.

GARDNER.—During Rev. F. E. Ramsdell's pastorate of five years the church has been enlarged at an expense of $40,000, there have been 192 additions and the pew rental is now the largest in the history of the church. Of the 120 persons uniting on confession 45 per cent. were young men.

FRANKLIN.—An interesting work of grace has been in progress during the past month under the lead of Rev. Ralph Gillam. The church has been quickened and about 300 persons have indicated a desire to lead a Christian life. At the annual sale of pews last Tuesday nearly every pew in the house was sold, and the premiums paid were the highest for years, if not in the history of the church. The present outlook is encouraging. Rev. C. W. Longren is the pastor.

BROCKTON.—Porter has added to its membership nearly 700 persons during the 14 years' pastorate of Rev. F. A. Warfield, who has now retired to enter upon a new work in Omaha, Neb. This is considerably more than half the number that has been enrolled since the organization of the church in 1850. It is notable that, notwithstanding the church has sent off 35 of its members to form the new Waldo Church, it still has a membership larger than on Jan. 1 last. It is still maintaining another branch chapel which gives promise of becoming a self-supporting, independent Congregational church within a year. The success of both enterprises is largely due to the energy and wise leadership of the former pastor. On the evening of April 24 the congregation extended to the retiring pastor and his family a reception, which was attended by a large concourse, including a number of his fellow-pastors, city officials and others outside the congregation. The social rooms were tastefully decorated and music and refreshments were provided. The feeling of affection and regret on the part of the people was silently voiced in a gift of $300 in gold.——Waldo. The section of the city in which this new church is established is the seat of a number of the largest shoe factories in the city and it is growing rapidly in population. It affords a field of great promise for religious work. The church starts free from debt and with ready means for its maintenance, with an energetic constituency and a pastor knowing well how to direct its work. This is the first English Congregational church organized in Brockton since the organization of Porter Church 46 years ago.

LOWELL.—Kirk Street. After a vacancy of two years in the pastorate this church has called Rev. W. A. Bartlett of Chicago, a son of ex-President Bartlett of Dartmouth College.

WORCESTER.—People's dedicated its new edifice April 26. Although undenominational, the organizer, pastor, majority of members and contributors are Congregationalists. The new building seats 300, has parlors, vestry and other conveniences, and cost with lot $8,250, two-thirds of which have been provided. Great credit is due the venerable Rev. W. T. Sleeper, who at the age of 77 has been pastor, solicitor and building committee, having promised to raise the funds, build the edifice and present it to the people free of debt.——Pilgrim. Dr. Lewis has begun a series of sermons on Gospel Athletics. ——Belmont has so outgrown its present building that a larger edifice has become a necessity and the committee is considering locations. In the past two years the church membership has increased 50 per cent. and the Sunday school 300 per cent. Rev. W. B. Oleson is pastor.——First Swedish has sold its house, which had become too small, to the Jews and is trying to secure the Salem Street property when that church unites with Union.——Salem Street had a lecture lately from Russell H. Conwell for the benefit of the Armenian relief fund.

SPENCER.—First. A deficit of $558 was cleared as the result of an appeal made at a recent morning service. The Men's League has been a decided success during its year and a half of work. The membership is 100. During this time 69 persons have been procured to assist with special music; 57 were from out of town. The expenses have been almost wholly met by offerings at the evening service.

SPRINGFIELD.—First. The ceiling in the auditorium has been pronounced unsafe and the house is closed for repairs. A new steel ceiling will be inserted and the auditorium painted and thoroughly renovated. A month or six weeks will probably be required for the work. Preaching services are meanwhile to be held in Court Square Theater. An orchestra has been secured and the choir will be assisted by a full chorus. Last Sunday the communion service was held in the chapel. Twenty new members were received. One Sunday school class of young women has paid a scholarship at Yankton College and at Atlanta University during the past year.——Hope. The pastor's council, composed of the heads of all organizations connected with the church, meets every two months for conference.——The gospel wagon begins its work in connection with the city mission this week, in charge of Evangelist H. I. Higgins. The wagon is supported by the C. E. Societies of Hampden County and will spend the summer working in the cities and towns as invitations are received.——At the Y. M. C. A. a series of noonday prayer meetings for business men was started this week and will be continued while the interest lasts. The meetings are half an hour in length and are conducted by the city pastors.

HOLYOKE.—Grace. The new edifice of this branch of Second Church was dedicated April 29. The house is small but is admirably located and will seat 200 persons. This capacity is enlarged by opening into the main room the Sunday school apartments, the parlor and the balcony rooms. The choir loft and pulpit are at one corner, and the pastor's room is at the front. The structure is of brick with brownstone trimmings. The cost was less than the subscriptions received. Rev. W. A. Remington offered the dedicatory prayer and Dr. C. A. Dickinson preached the sermon.

Maine.

DENMARK.—This church for some time was composed only of females. Last summer the meeting house was repaired and an earnest student from Bangor Seminary aroused much interest. Since its organization in 1829, the church had never had a settled minister. But now the people were surprised by generous subscriptions for a pastor's salary. Changes and growth have resulted. The Sunday school, Y. P. S. C. E. and the schoolhouse meetings held in seven districts of the town are signs of the interest, and some additions to the church have been received. Rev. C. F. Sargent is pastor.

ELIOT.—The past year has been hard in finances, but improvements costing about $200 have been made on the edifice. The pastor, Rev. A. L. Golder, and wife were favored with a donation recently. The C. E. Society holds meetings in two neighborhoods, which are well sustained, and the society is a great help and encouragement.

WELLS.—Second. The Ladies' Society recently held its 63d anniversary and gave a history of its past and present helpful work. The society has purchased and furnished a house for a vestry and has borne the expense of heating and lighting. It also cares for the poor of the town.

The church in Island Falls has received a bell inscribed as a gift from Capt. G. A. Carver of New York, in memory of his mother, Elizabeth Carver.

—In Center Lebanon there has been a remarkable vival, assisted by Messrs. Allen Folger and J. F. ibson.

New Hampshire.

CLAREMONT.—The new chapel connected with ie auditorium by two large arches with folding oors has been finished. Its various apartments in- ude parlor, dining room, kitchen and closets, also oom for an organ and choir. The structure is of rick, with granite trimmings, to correspond with ie church edifice. The beautiful windows are of thedral glass. The chapel presents an attractive ppearance and will be appreciated in the uses for hich it was designed. The meeting house is also ndergoing extensive repairs. A new steel ceiling id sides, to be appropriately frescoed, are being it in in the audience-room. Additional memorial indows are to be included, also hardwood floors. is to be fitted throughout with electric and gas ghts.

MANCHESTER.—First. The annual meeting was eld April 29. Financially the society is in a pros- erous condition. The advance of pew rents to rovide ample means to defray the expenses has let with nearly unanimous approval. Total re- ipts last year were $7,058 and expenses $6,377. pecial revival services have been in session for ree weeks at the Second Baptist meeting house, onducted by Rev. Mr. Pratt, D.D. The meetings ave been largely attended both day and evening y Christians from all the churches, and a large umber of persons have entered the new life.

HOLLIS.—A recent series of evangelistic services nder the auspices of the W. C. T. U. resulted in me conversions, but especially in a spiritual up- ft of Christians. The dedication or consecration rvice was tender and helpful, and can hardly fail be followed by a further blessing.

NASHUA.—First. The pastor, Dr. Cyrus Richard- on, expects to spend two months in Europe the oming summer. The church has very kindly ranted him leave of absence. The good wishes of any will go with him in his enjoyment of a well- arned vacation.

CONCORD.—First. A petition has recently been irculated among the pew owners looking to the onveyance of all pews to the society, with good rospect of ultimate success, as much interest is anifested.

Vermont.

BRIDGEWATER.—Rev. E. A. Whittier recently eld evangelistic services with this church, result- ng in the largest revival the town has ever known. his is the 29th series which Mr. Whittier has held n Vermont since he was invited here three years go by members of the Orange County Association. early 3,000 inquirers have been the results in Ver- ont.

Connecticut.

NEW HAVEN.—At the last Ministers' Meeting ev. J. H. Mason read a paper on The Old Calling nd the New.——United. Last Saturday evening iss Charlotte T. Sibley of Belfast, Me., gave a lec- ure on Constantinople in aid of the Armenian suf- erers. The contributions of the Sunday school or April will be given for a scholarship at Hamp- on.——Howard Avenue. The centennial of the irth of Horace Mann was observed May 3. The astor, Rev. W. J. Mutch, gave an evening address n Horace Mann and American Education. Indi- idual communion cups were used for the first time ast Sunday.——Up to the present time $3,733 have een collected in this city for the National Arme- ian Relief Committee.

CENTRAL VILLAGE.—The recent jubilee celebra- ion was attended by a large number of persons, nd the occasion was entirely successful. Rev. . M. Lord preached the anniversary sermon, which ontained many historical allusions of deep inter- st in the locality. During its existence the church as given for religious purposes a total of $75,000, he largest amount in gifts outside the church being ast year. In all 334 members have been connected ith the church. The percentage of male members s now larger than at the start.

COLUMBIA.—The recent installation of Rev. J. P. Harvey was the first service of the kind in the town or more than 45 years. The charge to the people was given by Rev. F. D. Avery, who had been the astor for almost half a century. Only five persons who were members of the church at the beginning of his pastorate were present. In Columbia first prang up the tender plant which, transferred to New Hampshire, grew into Dartmouth College.

ANDOVER.—A large, enthusiastic gathering at the parsonage, April 22, bade farewell to Rev. and Mrs. G. H. Curtis previous to their leaving for Killingworth in answer to a call. The pastor and his wife were generously remembered with valu- able gifts.

Mr. R. H. Smith has become editor of The Religious Herald of Hartford in place of Mr. E. D. Church, who has retired.——A vote in the Bristol church on the adoption of individual communion cups, last week, resulted in favor of the change.—— Of the $316 subscribed towards renovating the meeting house in Harwinton, nearly one-half was given by former residents.

MIDDLE STATES.

New York.

EAST ROCKAWAY.—Bethany, Rev. T. S. Braithwaite, pastor, held its annual meeting April 17. Reports showed gratifying results. There has been a large increase in membership and the spiritual condition of the church is greatly improved. Union prayer meetings were held in February and March and were richly blessed. The C. E. and Ladies' Societies have worked energetically, and it is largely owing to their work that the church has become self supporting and that an addition was built to the main building, which is now free of debt.

NEW YORK.—Broadway Tabernacle. The council dismissing Rev. Dr. Henry A. Stimson met April 28. Our letter from New York describes the council's action, and we publish elsewhere the finding of the council, prepared by a committee consisting of Drs. Storrs and Virgin and C. D. Wood, Esq.

New Jersey.

PASSAIC.—Growth continues to be steady at this church, additions being made at each communion, 27 in all within a year. This year the church will contribute to all the regular missionary causes. A new feature that has proved helpful is the monthly social, systematically conducted by different persons from month to month by an alphabetical arrangement. The result has been not only a material relief to the "faithful few," but the discovery of unknown talent and the hearty identification of many with the church activities who were formerly only nominal adherents.

NUTLEY.—The Ladies' Society has presented the church with a handsome individual communion service and has raised over $200 for the building fund. Easter was a day of rejoicing in many ways. The pastor, for 10 months disabled by loss of sight, was in his place again, and at the close of the service a thank offering was made for the building fund.

THE INTERIOR.

Ohio.

HUDSON.—On April 26 was observed the 70th anniversary of the laying of the corner stone of the first building of the college, which has developed into Western Reserve University now located at Cleveland, only the preparatory department remaining here. The exercises were held in the Congregational meeting house, where the ceremonies of laying the corner stone began. The present pastor, Rev. C. H. Small, preached a sermon on the Character, Object and Value of a True Education. Three evening addresses were given by the pastor, Dr. W. I. Chamberlain and Prof. F. W. Ashley on The Past, Present and Future. Two persons present 70 years ago were present at both services.

Indiana.

CASEYVILLE.—This church dedicated its new edifice April 26. Dr. H. J. Crum preached the sermon. This is a mining town and the church was organized three years ago under the labors of Rev. James Hayes. The coal mine company gave a lot and $50. Miss Sarah Aldrich of Northfield, Mass., gave $300 and the Congregationalists of Brazil gave $100. The total cost was about $1,000. The dimensions are 28 by 48 feet. The building is a frame house with brick foundation and has high wainscoting and colored windows. A collection was taken in the evening service for the C. H. M. S. Mr. Charles Hill, a licentiate, supplies the pulpit.

INDIANAPOLIS.—Union was organized April 28 with 21 members. The hall not being ready for use the tent of the State H. M. S. was pitched for the occasion. Rev. F. M. Whitlock preached the sermon to a large congregation. The membership represents six denominations with no former Congregationalists and seems earnest and united. The Ladies' Aid Society has 36 members. A lot has been secured and a subscription is in progress for a chapel. A Sunday school has been organized. Rev. O. D. Fisher has charge of the work temporarily and is assisted by the other pastors.

Michigan.

WYANDOTTE.—This young church is grieved by the departure of its pastor, Dr. D. P. Breed, after about four years of service. From an original membership of 27 the church has grown to over 100, and is active in all lines. At the farewell reception appreciative words were spoken in reviewing the pleasant relationship between pastor and people, and valuable gifts were presented the pastor's family. Resolutions of regret at the closing pastorate and gratitude for past blessings were passed. Dr. Breed goes to Creston, Io.

CONKLIN.—By a spontaneous movement of the people in this little town, a council was called to assist in the organization of a Congregational church in which members of all denominations in the town unite. The council heartily approved of the organization, which has 12 members and $1,000 in sight for a building. It is the only church of any denomination within a radius of six miles in a thickly populated farming region.

THE WEST.

Iowa.

MANSON AND CENTER.—A canvass for funds for a new house of worship at Manson, to cost $8,000, has met with encouraging response, about $4,000 having been pledged in less than two weeks. A new edifice for the Center people is now building, funds already having been raised to cover its cost. Rev. George Marsh is pastor of this double field.

IOWA FALLS.—Great interest has been aroused by the special tent meetings under the leadership of Evangelist C. N. Hunt of Minneapolis. The meetings are largely attended and the converts are said to be numbered by hundreds.

MARSHALLTOWN.—Rev. C. R. Gale has been giving his people a series of illustrated lectures on Our Neighbors, the Cubans, which have attracted much interest.

LARCHWOOD.—Rev. D. E. Evans has begun work here with good prospect. There were several accessions at the May communion.

Minnesota.

MINNEAPOLIS.—Fifth Avenue. Rev. J. E Smith's pastorate opens auspiciously. This church is situated in a growing part of the city and is destined to make great progress in the next five years.—— Bethany. The new pastor, Rev. J. W. Heyward, begins work with good prospects. Congregations are increasing and the burden of an unmanageable debt has been removed.——Forest Heights. The new pastor, Rev. R. A. Hadden, is greeted with large and enthusiastic congregations. A year having been spent in building, the church is now ready to devote all its energies to spiritual work.

NEW ULM.—Rev. J. P. Campbell has closed his work, having been pastor for three years. During his ministry there has been a revival, with about 50 accessions at one communion, and the church has been greatly strengthened.

WALKER.—Efforts are being made to secure a subscription and gifts of lumber with which to build a small chapel on a lot already given. Services are held in the depot with good attendance.

NEW RICHLAND.—By the ministry of Rev. F. H. Oehler, the first resident pastor for years, the church has been greatly built up and an out-station opened at Otisco. The pastor preaches at one other point. Much enthusiasm is awakened along all lines of Christian work.

The pastorless church in Marietta has raised a subscription and secured the services of a neighboring minister.

Kansas.

PAULINE.—Under the leadership of Rev. J. E. Kirkpatrick of Seabrook and Supt. A. S. Bush a Christian Union Association was organized April 19 at this rural point near Topeka. Thus the way is open for religious work in connection with that now in successful progress at Seabrook and Sunnyside. On the same day these brethren reorganized the Sunday school at Fairview School House near Pauline. The way has been prepared for these movements by the faithful efforts last year of Rev. and Mrs. S. D. Storrs.

DUNLAP.—Rev. W. R. Bair accepts his call to continue as pastor for a year from May 1. This church has two branches called Big John and Sunnyside, and the work on the entire field is in an encouraging condition.

ALANTHUS.—The church organized April 19 at this rural point in Gove County was the result of revival meetings conducted by Rev. I. M. Waldrop of Buffalo Park.

CAPIOMA.—Rev. B. M. Maggs, a Methodist evangelist who is to spend the summer here, has been engaged to supply the pulpit during the coming months.

MILFORD.—This enterprise, which a year ago entered into an arrangement with other churches in town to have union and undenominational services under one pastor, has closed its connection with the movement and engaged Mr. F. P. Strong of the Senior Class of Washburn College for the summer, intending to have a permanent pastor in the fall.

State Evangelist Veazie has returned to Topeka after six weeks' work in Western Kansas. He held continuous revival services at Wallace and Athol and made brief visits at Brookville, Kirwin, Smith Center and Milford. In all instances special needs were successfully met and the churches prepared for larger service.——The Carson church has recently purchased a $100 bell, and is stimulated to fresh efforts.——Rev. H. L. Marsh of Sabetha, who has been supplying acceptably at Oneida, consents to continue his labors till July.

Nebraska.

WESCOTT.—Mr. C. E. Howard of Chicago Seminary will have charge here for the summer in connection with Sargent.

MOLINE.—This church, weakened by removals and financial depression, asked advice lately of a council as to the surrender of its work. As another denomination offered to buy the property and continue work in the neighborhood, the council advised its sale and the disbanding of the church.

Colorado.

CRIPPLE CREEK.—Among the losses by the recent great conflagration was the Congregational house of worship, which was totally destroyed.

PACIFIC COAST.

California.

SAN FRANCISCO. — The apparently sensational topic of Rev. H. E. Jewett, statistical secretary of the General Association, at a recent meeting of the Monday Club, was The Exit of the Four Hundred. The address, however, was of a statistical nature, the "exit" being that of 400 members from the rolls of the churches during the past year.

CANADA.

New Brunswick.

MILLTOWN.—This place, just over the line, belongs to Washington County Conference. The pastor Rev. William Williams, reports a season of prosperity. The congregations are as large as the meeting house will accommodate and the Sunday school is full and helpful.

OTHER CHRISTIAN WORK.

Under the joint State executive committee of the Y. M. C. A. of New Hampshire and Vermont a field secretary has aided various associations, as was needed, and looked after the young men in the smaller towns, especially where there are and can be no associations. Deputations of young men who volunteer for the service have worked for a week or more among the scattered people and endeavored to awaken an interest. Encouraging results have followed the past year and a half. Nearly 250 persons began the Christian life, a gratifying result fully justifying the undertaking. Larger results are anticipated in the future when present plans are consummated. The work is mainly supported by the individual gifts of interested friends.

The spring meeting of the Woman's Home Missionary Association at Worcester last week Wednesday was an especially enjoyable one. The comparison of methods of work as presented by leaders of societies all over the State was full of helpful suggestions. The Sunday school work in Oregon was so effectively described by Rev. Ralph A. Rowley that a collection was afterwards taken that amounted to $87. The social hour at noon brought together informally women from many cities and towns, who enjoyed the generous hospitality of the Worcester ladies and conversation with one another. Miss F. J. Dyer brought timely hints of other lines along which our work may be prosecuted, illustrating her thought by mention of a recent massing of children in the Lynn schools to hear the thrilling story of how Marcus Whitman saved Oregon, and emphasizing the patriotic side of home missionary work as appealing to classes in current events in woman's clubs.

The newly elected officers of the six Intercollegiate Young Men's Christian Associations of Boston held their annual training conference at Association Building Saturday and Sunday, April 18, 19. The conference, composed of 37 officers, was conducted by the intercollegiate secretary, Robert E. Lewis. Addresses were made by Mr. S. M. Sayford, college evangelist, Rev. H. P. Beach, secretary of the Student Volunteer Movement, Prof. George K. Morris of Boston University, Rev. Dr. James M. Gray of Boston, Mr. Ralph C. Thomas of Harvard University, Mr. A. B. Brown of Harvard Medical School, State Sec. R. M. Armstrong and General Secretary Mehaffey of Boston. These college associations are the organized religious force in the six foremost Boston colleges—Massachusetts Institute of Technology (1,187 students), Harvard Medical School (507 students), Boston University Law School (345 students), College of Liberal Arts (385 students) and medical school (185 students) and Massachusetts College of Pharmacy (270 students). The Intercollegiate Association has 308 members, conducts six weekly religious meetings at the various colleges, has 77 students in three college Bible classes, holds classes for the study of missions and has among its leaders twelve who plan to go to the foreign field.

THE Syndicate Publishing Co. now announce another material advance in the price of their popular Encyclopædic Dictionary, to take effect on June 1. Between now and that date any of our readers can secure this great work upon a payment of $1 and twelve subsequent monthly payments of $1.40 each, having possession of the four volumes during the entire time. It is generally conceded that this work is unequaled in accuracy of its definitions and fullness of treatment of all words and subjects. That it has kept right up to date is shown by the presence of such words as "aseptolin" and "Roentgen Rays" and other words which have been in use but a few months. Strong testimonials as to the high character and reliability of the work have lately been given by such men as Dr. Parkhurst, ex-Postmaster Bissell, Supreme Judge Dickman and many others whose indorsements are surely sufficient to uphold the claim of its publishers that the Encyclopædic Dictionary is a prime necessity in every household.

That

Extreme tired feeling afflicts nearly everybody at this season The hustlers cease to push, the tireless grow weary, the energetic become enervated. You know just what we mean. Some men and women endeavor temporarily to overcome that

Tired

Feeling by great force of will. But this is unsafe, as it pulls powerfully upon the nervous system, which will not long stand such strain. Too many people "work on their nerves," and the result is seen in unfortunate wrecks marked "nervous prostration," in every direction. That tired

Feel=

ing is a positive proof of thin, weak, impure blood; for, if the blood is rich, red, vitalized and vigorous, it imparts life and energy to every nerve, organ and tissue of the body. The necessity of taking Hood's Sarsaparilla for that tired feeling is, therefore, apparent to every one, and the good it will do you is equally beyond question. Remember that

A NEW TRIO.

Never before have these three stars appeared in the same Furniture Constellation. Here we combine a Bookcase, Secretary Desk and Parlor Cabinet with curio case. It is one of the most successful pieces ever designed.

Protected by glass doors from dust, dirt, borrowers and book-worms, there is storage under lock and key for one hundred volumes. There are five outside drawers of three different sizes for engravings, photographs, papers, music, curios, etc. There are three shelves for ornaments.

The Curio Cabinet has a semi-circular plate glass front with plate glass shelf. It is large enough to accommodate a dozen articles.

The Writing Desk is finally planned. It has the full overhang, and its interior cabinet work is of the latest pattern; there are 4 pigeon holes, 2 racks for books, 1 shelf, 2 large filing boxes, 1 drawer and a square compartment for pens, ink, etc.

Apply at once to "Reverend M.," 123 Cross Street, Somerville, Mass. High class references given.

THE AMERICAN SUNDAY SCHOOL UNION has been at work seventy-one years for the retired rural districts. Its union methods specially commend it to communities of sparse populations divided in religious sentiments. Its missionaries visit families, distribute religious literature, hold evangelistic meetings and organize Sunday Schools. Probably no evangelizing agency has larger results for the amount expended. 11,000,000 children are yet out of Sunday School. Will you help to save them? Send to Rev. Addison P. Foster, D. ## THE BUSINESS OUTLOOK.

The improvement in the general merchandise movement is not up to expectations. However, at many of the largest centers, a fair volume of business is doing. Prices show no decided improvement, but the present general level is considered firm.

In Fall River the glut of print cloths continues and it is feared that a general shutdown of the mills there will have to be resorted to, to cure the evil. The poor condition of the general cotton manufacturing industry is more or less reflected by the decline in cotton mill securities, not only at Fall River, but at the Saturday and Wednesday auctions in this city.

There is little or no improvement in the woolen trade, and as for leather, the Leather Trust is understood to be selling goods at very low prices. The movement in boots and shoes is fair. In rubber boots and shoes, it is, of course, between seasons, but the trade here is agitated by rumors of outside competition to the Rubber Trust, to be carried on by former trust men, who do not like the methods of the present management.

As regards money, it is easy to the right borrower and on satisfactory collateral. Mercantile paper of the better grade is scarce. In the stock market trading has been narrow and prices none too strong. Speculation is not rampant, and, in the absence of outside public interest, is confined mainly to Stock Exchange circles.

BIOGRAPHICAL.

EDMUND KIMBALL ALDEN, D.D.

After several months of impaired health, not serious enough to awaken real solicitude, Dr. Alden passed suddenly into the higher life, April 30, at the age of seventy-one. He was a direct descendant, in the seventh generation, of John Alden of Mayflower fame, and his father was a distinguished physician in Randolph, where the son was born, and at whose village academy he prepared for college. He was graduated from Amherst in 1844, received from there the degree of D. D., and was for many years one of its trustees. After a year's teaching in Williston Seminary he took the course at Andover Seminary, and two years later, in 1850, was ordained pastor at Yarmouth, Me. His ministerial life covered a period of twenty-six years, and was spent, in addition to the Maine pastorate, in Lenox and with the Phillips Church, South Boston.

But Dr. Alden will be remembered chiefly for his conspicuous service in connection with the American Board, being home secretary from 1876 to 1893. His important work during these years is appreciatively described elsewhere by his successor, Dr. Daniels. In 1850 Dr. Alden married Maria Hyde of Bath, Me., who is left alone in feeble health to mourn his loss, no children having been born to them.

The funeral at the Park Street Church, Monday noon, was attended by many. Rev. Dr. A. E. Thompson paid the formal tribute.

Bubbles or Medals.

"Best sarsaparillas." When you think of it how contradictory that term is. For there can be only one best in anything—one best sarsaparilla, as there is one highest mountain, one longest river, one deepest ocean. And that best sarsaparilla is ——?.... There's the rub! You can measure mountain height and ocean depth, but how test sarsaparilla? You could if you were chemists. But then do you need to test it? The World's Fair Committee tested it,—and thoroughly. They went behind the label on the bottle. What did this sarsaparilla test result in? Every make of sarsaparilla shut out of the Fair except Ayer's. So it was that Ayer's was the only sarsaparilla admitted to the World's Fair. The committee found it the best. They had no room for anything that was not the best. And as the best, Ayer's Sarsaparilla received the medal and awards due its merits. Remember the word "best" is a bubble any breath can blow; but there are pins to prick such bubbles. Those others are blowing more "best sarsaparilla" bubbles since the World's Fair pricked the old ones. True, but Ayer's Sarsaparilla has the medal. The pin that scratches the medal proves it gold. The pin that pricks the bubble proves it wind. We point to medals, not bubbles, when we say: The best sarsaparilla is Ayer's.

WOMAN'S BOARD PRAYER MEETING.

PILGRIM HALL, CONGREGATIONAL HOUSE, BOSTON, MAY 1.

Miss Frances J. Dyer presided and spoke of the fact that we are living in a remarkable time, that crises seem to be a part of the divine plan, that this condition is so marked at present as to attract the attention of many outside the active work of the church, and that God's people have been carried through crises just as they have drawn closer to Him.

In the close union which exists between Christian workers, the Woman's Board of the Interior was mentioned as the calendar topic for the day, and Mrs. Kellogg led the petitions in behalf of that board.

The work and workers in Smyrna having been much in mind during the week, it was a great privilege to hear about it all from Mr. Bartlett, who has labored for twelve years in that city. Miss Nellie Bartlett is at present in Boston, but under medical treatment, and was unable to come in and tell of her own kindergarten, in which so many children in this country have been interested, but the story of its success was a bright one, as her father told of the forty-five children with their "mother play," their Christmas giving and their sending of fruit and flowers to the hospitals and of the training classes, from which Miss Bartlett and Miss Saunders have sent out teachers to establish kindergartens elsewhere in Turkey. He also spoke of the girls' boarding school and of the boys' school, in which the Scriptures are always taught, while in the competing schools no positive religious instruction is given. A very hopeful aspect of the work in Smyrna was presented, shaded a little by the present retrenchment.

Miss Stanwood gave a message from Mrs. S. W. Howland full of appreciation of the sympathy and prayers in behalf of Dr. Howland during his long illness and begging that prayers may still be offered that his recovery may be speedy and sure.

Mrs. Smith gave the latest word from Miss Child as she was on her way from Canton to Foochow.

STARVED to death in midst of plenty. Unfortunate, yet we hear of it. The Gail Borden Eagle Brand Condensed Milk is undoubtedly the safest and best infant food. Infant Health is a valuable pamphlet for mothers. Send your address to the New York Condensed Milk Co., New York.

A NEW DISCOVERY.—The year 1896 has revealed a new piece of furniture. This latest invention is a clever combination of three separate pieces, namely, a secretary writing desk, a bookcase and a parlor cabinet with curio case. From all appearances this new piece of furniture bids fair to be very popular. It is described in another column in the announcement of the Paine Furniture Co.

BUFFALO LITHIA WATER

Spring No. 1.

IN NERVOUS INDICESTION.

DR. P. A. FLOURNOY, Charlotte Court House, Va.:

"My Nervous System was shattered, my digestion difficult and painful, the stomach often rejecting the lightest possible article of food. I was greatly depressed in spirit, and had but little hope of any improvement in my condition. Upon a diet of tea and Crackers I visited the Buffalo Springs and put myself upon the Water of Spring No. 1. I was soon conscious of an increase both of the appetite and digestive power, and at the same time, of a gradual increase of Nervous Vigor. This improvement continued through a protracted stay at the Springs, and to such an extent that before leaving I was able to eat with impunity any article of food found upon the hotel table. I left the Springs fully restored, and returned home to enter actively upon the arduous duties of my profession."

This Water is for sale by druggists generally, or in cases of one dozen half-gallon bottles, $5.00 f. o. b. at the Springs. Descriptive pamphlets sent free to any address. Springs open for guests from June 15th to October 1st.

OSTON CONGREGATIONAL PERILS.

In addition to the usual audience at the oston Ministers' Meeting last Monday, many ends of Dr. Nehemiah Boynton were pres- t to listen to his farewell address. Dr. oynton believes the historic principle of Con- egationalism, its independence, is its chief ril today, and that the churches in old Boston pecially can only survive and prosper by in- oducing a principle of association. In years st the city churches were largely carried on a few consecrated, wealthy men. If there any criticism to be made upon their meth- ls it is that they did not train younger men succeed them.

The necessary principle of association may introduced, the speaker believes, by re- ranging the conference relations of the Bos- n churches, by strengthening the feeling of otherhood between Boston ministers and ose in charge of suburban churches, by a oser, more sympathetic relation with the be- volent societies, and by a united effort to ild a new Congregational House which shall worthy of the denomination. At the close Dr. Boynton's remarks Drs. Smith Baker d Barton expressed their appreciation of s personal graces and his work in Boston d wished him Godspeed in his new field.

On motion of Dr. Little, Drs. Furber, Ham- n and Lansing were appointed to draw up solutions of respect and sympathy for the mily of the late Dr. Alden, to be presented a future meeting.

GOVERNOR WOLCOTT'S VETO.

Prefacing his message with a statement of me of the minor, technical and legal ques- ons involved in the law intended to affect e First Church, Lowell, Governor Wolcott ncludes thus:

Upon general considerations of public pol- y I do not think the bill is wise.

It is not only special legislation, but is leg- lation which directly takes sides in a church ntroversy, some of the issues of which are ready before the court for determination.

I think the policy of the commonwealth is st carried out when the State abstains, so r as may be, from interference with church fairs and requires members of religious or- anizations to settle their affairs under the ise provision of the general laws upon our atute-books.

It has been strongly claimed and I doubt ot that the members of the legislature were fluenced by the belief that the equities of e case required the passage of the bill.

On this point I do not feel called upon, for e purposes of this message, to express an inion, but it is proper to observe that the lity of the Congregational body provides a ibunal to hear and settle church dissensions, wit, a council of churches, and that this ethod of adjudicating differences has been eclined by the petitioners for the present gislation.

I cannot but believe that the members of e legislature have been influenced by the nsideration of the apparent equities of the resent case to disregard the general policy hich should animate all legislation, to wit, at special legislation is at all times to be eprecated, and that the State should keep loof from and not interfere in the affairs of eligious corporations. To do so would, in y judgment, not only be unwise as a matter f public policy, but would invite the fre- uent application for such interference to the xtent that the legislature would find itself alled upon to be the court of appeal in all hurch affairs where the members and officers ound themselves unable to agree.

For the foregoing reasons I am unable to pprove the bill. ROGER WOLCOTT.

The veto will be sustained. The House urned a somersault, and by a vote of 160 to 16 efused to pass the bill.

RESULT OF COUNCIL, BROADWAY TABERNACLE, NEW YORK CITY.

Whereas, Rev. Henry A. Stimson, D. D., has resigned his office as pastor of the Broadway Tabernacle Church in New York, and the church, by a vote duly certified to us, has accepted his resignation, it only remains for the council to recognize and declare the termination of the said pastorate, on the first of May following, to ex press its regret for it and to convey its fraternal regard to those primarily affected by it.

Rev. Dr. Stimson came to this office three years ago from the city of St. Louis, in which he had been and was most highly honored and tenderly beloved, and in which his Christian labor and leadership, under God's favor, had been attended with extraordinary success. He came with reluctance, after prolonged hesitation, only in answer to the urgent and unanimous call of this church, as re-enforced by the ardent desire of its former revered pastor, Dr. William M. Taylor, and by the equally earnest and strenuous desires of other pastors in this neighborhood between whom and himself there was, and is, the most unreserved confidence. He came fully understanding that peculiar difficulties attended this position, but resolved in a spirit of courageous consecration to do whatever the Master should permit, by faithful service to this church and congregation, to all the churches affiliated with it, and to all the Christian interests which he might assist in this great metropolitan center.

He has wrought, with unsparing use of all his remarkable gifts and powers, for the furtherance of the divine cause thus in a measure committed to his hands, and has had the joy of seeing the work for God and man, in different directions, greatly prospering under his influence. In the Sunday school of this church, in its missionary work, in its benevolent contributions, in the numbers assembled in it for worship and in the influence exerted by him on the churches of the vicinity, his Christian success has been conspicuous, fully justifying the confident expectations of those who eagerly urged him to come hither.

Certain special difficulties encountered by him, and apparently not to be removed or overcome, have, however, led him to feel that he must seek another field for future labor, and by reason of this conviction on his part, assented to by the church, the council most regretfully confirms their common action and declares his pastorate closed, according to the terms of his letter of resignation. The council gladly avails itself of the opportunity most earnestly and affectionately to commend Dr. Stimson to all the churches which it represents, and to all the churches of our Lord Jesus Christ, as an able and honored pastor and preacher—noble in spirit, sound in the faith, catholic in sympathy, while faithful to his special communion, devoted to his spiritual work and full of rich enthusiasm for it. He has greatly endeared himself to the ministers and churches assembled in this council, and to ministers and churches of other names in the city. He has given to us and to them wise counsel, animating impulse and personal inspiration in the years of his recent presence among us; and for his future usefulness and reward in any work to which the Master may call him, we, with undoubting confidence, look forward. Not in the pulpit only, on the platform, in committees and in conferences, as well as in the closer fellowship of familiar personal intercourse, he will bring to others, we are sure, as constant and generous a blessing as he has brought to us.

The council presents, also, assurances of its fraternal regard to the church which has called it together, and earnestly trusts that the distinguished history of this church during the more than fifty years of its existence will be continued, and its Christian prosperity be maintained and advanced, under the divine favor, in the years to come.

LUCINDA TAYLOR BARBER,

The wife of Rev. Luther H. Barber, died at Ellington, Ct., April 20, in the seventy-eighth year of her age. For more than fifty-three years she had worked with her husband in the Master's kingdom. By her kind and winning manner she drew to herself to an unusual degree the hearts of all who knew her. Her thorough knowledge of the Bible, her intense love for souls and her own consecrated life admirably fitted her for the place which she so nobly filled, especially for her successful work among the young men in the Sunday school, ten of whom from her own class at one time united with the church. Throughout her whole life she was deeply interested in the work of all our missionary societies and was always ready to make sacrifices in their behalf. The same unselfish spirit characterized her in the home where her cheerfulness and vivacity brought continual sunshine and gladness to the hearts of those who loved her best.

Though an invalid during the closing years of her life, she retained these characteristics to the last, and looked forward not only with hope but with intense longing for the day when she should depart and be with Christ. She was tenderly and lovingly cared for by her husband and only daughter, who in their loneliness and sorrow have the sympathy of a large circle of neighbors and friends, in whose hearts Mrs. Barber had a warm and abiding place. But they sorrow not as those who have no hope, for in their grief they find comfort in the glorious hope which she cherished and in the precious memories which she has left them.

REV. VICTOR EUGENE LOBA,

Born in St. Louis, Jan. 21, 1854, of Swiss parentage, the brother of Rev. Dr. Loba of Evanston, Ill., and of Mrs. Prof. C. A. Beckwith of Bangor, Me., and three other sisters, he was educated at Olivet College and at Hartford and Oberlin Seminaries. As minister and teacher he labored in Sleepy Eye, Minn., Eldon and Siloam Springs, Ark., and Noble, Mo., where his earthly work ended April 20. A wife and five children survive him. He was a man with a heart close to nature, a fine classical scholar, a writer of exquisite English style. Although suffering bodily infirmity from early childhood and under constant provocations to bitterness and melancholy, he maintained a spirit of sunny cheerfulness. He felt that places remote from centers of business and culture need the influence of educated as well as consecrated men, and he himself responded to this call and longed that many more might share with him this opportunity for the Master. He has left the legacy of a brave, unselfish life spent for others and of a strong faith in the living God, noble in its simplicity.

C. A. B.

MRS. JULIA M. DAVIS

Died in Malden, Mass., on Friday, May 1, at 9.30 A.M., in the sixty-seventh year of her age. In early life she devoted herself to the Lord, and for fifty years or more it has been her delight to serve him. For the last fifteen years she has been a faithful member of the First Congregational Church in Malden, but the greater part of her life was spent in Haverhill, Mass. There and in Malden she was well known as one tender in heart, gentle in manner and fruitful in life. What was said of Dorcas could truthfully be applied to her: "This woman was full of good works and almsdeeds which she did." Two sisters and a brother survive her, and a large number feel with them that in her death they have lost a dear friend. "He giveth his beloved sleep."

ANDOVER THEOLOGICAL SEMINARY.

TO the Spirit of truth, to the Divine Author of our faith, to the only Wise God, we desire in sincerity to present this our humble offering; devoutly imploring the Father of lights richly to endue with wisdom from above all his servants, the Trustees of this Seminary; and with spiritual understanding the Professors therein; that, being illuminated by the Holy Spirit, their doctrine may drop as the rain, and their speech distil as the dew; and that their Pupils may become trees of renown in the courts of our God, whereby He may be glorified.—Extract from the deed establishing the seminary, 1807.

EDUCATION.

—— Mr. Elward A. MacDowell has been elected professor of music at Columbia University, New York city.

—— Examinations at the Lay College, Revere, begin May 18, 19 The anniversary exercises will be held on the evening of May 20.

—— The students of Mills Seminary, California, have made a free will offering of $60 to the Armenian Relief Fund, raised through the sale of their individual handiwork.

—— Rev. Henry Goodwin Smith of Freehold, N. J., has been elected professor of systematic theology in Lane Seminary, Cincinnati, O., where he will take the place so ably filled for many years by Prof. Edward D. Morris, D.D.

—— Barnard College succeeded last week in raising the $100,000 necessary to secure a gift of $100,000 from an unknown New Yorker, who made his gift conditional upon the raising of a like amount before May 10. This secures to what is practically the woman's department of Columbia University a superb site on Morningside Heights, New York city, and relieves the friends of the institution from a burden of fear.

—— Perusal of the annual catalogue of the Worcester Polytechnic Institute shows that this high grade institution is flourishing by adhering to its somewhat peculiar views respecting the technical education which mechanical and civil engineers, electricians and chemists need. "Laboratory methods" rule. A liberal education is made the foundation of the special knowledge afterward added. In the workshops less emphasis than customary is laid on manual skill and more put upon developing constructive ability and comprehension of higher principles.

RECALLED STORMY TIMES.—"Well that looks natural," said the old soldier looking at a can of condensed milk on the breakfast table in place of ordinary milk that failed on account of the storm. "It's the Gail Borden Eagle Brand we used during the war."

Prof. J. HENRY THAYER, Harvard University, writes:

"Prof. Fisher has trained the public to expect the excellences of scholarship, candor, judicial equipoise, and admirable lucidity and elegance of style in whatever comes from his pen. But in the present work he seems to have surpassed himself. It is a charming volume. The justice of this epithet—however unusual in reference to a work on such a topic—will be proven by the reluctance with which whoever begins to read it will lay it down."

Bishop JOHN F. HURST writes:

"A strong and thorough treatment of this important subject. . . . It presents so many new and fresh points and is so thoroughly treated, and brings into view contemporaneous thought, especially the American, that it is a pleasure to read it, and will be an equal pleasure to go back to it again and again."

IN commenting upon the results of a year's work by the British Wesleyans, the London Christian World draws the lesson that "the condition of success in religion, as elsewhere, lies in swift and accurate adaptation of organization to environment." This is a truth which Congregationalists cannot afford to overlook in their adjustment of polity to the needs of the present. We referred last week to this matter as it affects our Boston churches, and repeat that the question is urgent, and that the assertion of independence must not hinder some practical and businesslike plan of fellowship which shall make it possible to employ the resources of the denomination to the best advantage for the support of long established positions and the opening of new work among the heterogeneous elements of our population. Our Methodist brethren have set us an example in this respect in the appointment of a young and vigorous superintendent of their Boston Missionary and Church Extension Society. Selected with special reference to experience and executive ability, he is to have general charge of all the departments of city mission work, and especially of planning for the occupation of strategic points and maintenance of church life among the poor. We are not afraid of a little centralization in Congregational Boston—the centrifugal tendency is too strong among us to make it dangerous. The need is pressing. Unless the fellowship of the churches can find expression in well-planned co-operation, our opportunity will be given to others. Congregationalism, for all its wonderful history, does not possess a mortgage upon the Christianity of Massachusetts. In "the swift and accurate adaptation of organism to environment" lies its one hope of future leadership.

The meeting of the General Association of Massachusetts last year at Lynn was notable because for the first time every church in the commonwealth had the privilege and right of being represented by a lay delegate as well as by its pastor. The meeting at Fall River, May 19-21, bids fair to be notable for certain reforms calculated to give greater opportunity for expression of opinion and such debate and comparison of views as will lead to weightier constructive action when action seems necessary. It is hoped that hereafter machinery will be less prominent and spirit and life more so. The local committee is disposed to be unusually hospitable, and a program has been prepared which affords opportunity for facing some of our most pressing denominational problems. Church incorporation, Sunday observance, gambling, the Board of Pastoral Supply, the church and organized labor, the wider circulation of religious literature, temperance and Sunday schools will be reported upon by standing committees. Enrichment of the church service, the relation of the Y. P. S. C. E. to the church, the limitations of hospitality to ministers of other denominations, the relation of the church to good citizenship will be set forth in brief, live, yet formal papers, and the need of denominational loyalty and the consecration of wealth will be described and urged with force by able exponents at the popular evening sessions. Fall River Congregationalists are eager to welcome many. Let many go.

The officials of the American Missionary Association do well to set before their constituents the record of the Pilgrim Congregational Church of the Santee Agency, Nebraska, a mission church among the Indians under the care of the association. It has a resident membership of only sixty-two, those being the missionaries and the Indians among whom they labor, and yet last year this church contributed $559.75 to five of our denominational societies, to the Dakota Native Missionary Society and to aid two sister churches, besides raising $137.48 for local expenses. No wonder Secretary Ryder writes: "If the churches throughout the country would even approach the generosity of this missionary church the debt of the association would be raised at once. Think of it! An average of more than $9 per member for distinctively missionary activities outside of the church itself and more than $11 per member for the spread of the gospel and the maintenance of church services! Where is the church that equals the record of this missionary church on the prairie?" Truly, where is it?

Despite the changed and by no means improved business conditions, and notwithstanding retrenchment on every hand—save in national expenditures—the stream of gifts and bequests by citizens of the United States to religious, educational and eleemosynary institutions flows wider and fuller as the years go by. In Appleton's Annual Encyclopedia for 1893 there appeared for the first time a most valuable collocation of facts respecting such gifts and bequests for public purposes during the year '93. Only gifts of $5,000 or more were included, and the total for that year was $29,000,000. In 1894, in a similar statement, a total of $32,000,000 was recorded, and in the volume for 1895, just issued, a total of $32,800,000 is announced. Several of the items in the record for 1895 are significant and valuable, for they define the large channels through which the river flows. Educational institutions received $18,194,855, religious and charitable institutions $10,444,363, libraries $1,644,000, and more than $1,000,000 were given for the erection of public monuments to commemorate the deeds of heroes or to keep green the memory of great men and good. Nowhere in the world can such a record as this be duplicated. More and more our men of wealth are coming to have a sense of stewardship. Instead of relying on State aid and thus fostering State interference with institutions which flourish best when controlled by individuals, our colleges, churches, art museums, libraries and hospitals keep in touch with individuals and families, rely on them for aid and are not disappointed.

The ministry of Jesus is a ministry of self-denial. No man is wise to enter upon or continue in it without recognizing and accepting this as the first condition of his consecration. To cherish an ambition for the easy places, the large pay and the high social consideration of the churches in our great centers of population is to put the wrong motive at the front. No man succeeds, or can succeed, in great places without a great devotion. The larger opportunity used at its best involves a larger self-denial. That man who, in the higher sense, succeeds is the man who is eager for work—any work that helps the kingdom and lies within his reach, because he realizes the infinitude of the opportunities and the comparative littleness of selfish gains. He must give himself, like Paul, with an unquenchable enthusiasm founded upon an intense conviction. Such men are needed in the ministry as they have always been, and they will be sure to find their work and do it, as Paul did, and Francis of Assisi, and Luther and Whitefield and Wesley and Livingstone and a thousand other pioneers in the history of the church. They will be devoted, heart and soul, to just one thing, and the recognition of the world will come to them without their asking, probably in the form of persecution first, but afterwards of honor. For young men just choosing a career in life the ministry is the greatest opportunity of all, if only they can hold their thought of it upon this high level of self-consecration. No better investment of the choicest natural gifts could possibly be made. But for the man who takes up theology as a trade which is not too difficult, and which brings some immediate rewards, the prospect of the time is anything but encouraging.

In God's choice of men as instruments he asks rather what may be made of them than what they already are. He takes Jacob, who is certainly a less agreeable man than Esau, because he knows that he is capable of developing into something which is beyond Esau's reach. There is dross in every man. We are compelled to acknowledge that our dearest friends have grievous faults. But the practical question seems to be whether we are all dross, so that the fire will burn us up and leave no gold behind, or whether we may be tried by fire and come forth all true gold at last. And upon this question will depend God's choice of us as partners in his eternal plan. In other words, God fashions his instruments anew while he uses them. Every work of man for God is accompanied by a work of God in man. While the work grows the man grows with it. Even though the work itself to all outward seeming is a failure, the deeper triumph of a regenerated character remains. The church triumphant must be taken into account as well as the church militant in making up the sum of what our Lord accomplished and of the development of his kingdom. The generations slip away from earth, but their victories of character, held for a little while in loving remembrance here, are garnered and utilized in the abiding place of God. It is a short-sighted view which limits the accomplishment of the Holy Spirit to what he does through men. The broad view takes account also of the imperishable work which he has done in men, of which the obedient purity of heaven is the abiding witness.

MEASURING GROWTH.

There is something infinitely suggestive in the slow but continual progress of the spring. It makes us impatient, it makes us glad, it makes us wonder. At first a change of sky, a breath from the South, the first glimpse of a bluebird's wing against the colder azure of the sky, the call of a song sparrow from the weeds or stubble of the roadside, it grows through the vision of springing grass in moist places and the tinkling hurry of snow-fed streams, to full shadowy, lacelike images of delicate green leaves, the glitter of marsh marigolds, the hillside pale with its millions of houstonia cups, the visits of the migrating Northern birds and the familiar notes of our own summer choristers. There is an order, but it is mysterious. There is a date for all arrivals, but it varies according to the shifting of a calendar in whose making man had neither part nor lot. There is a growth, but it eludes our observation, though we mark how the world has brightened in a warm night after rain, or changed after a day of sunshine.

So is the coming of the fullness of the kingdom in a human heart. There is the life which God has given, a life which is ready to respond to the shining of his light and the refreshment of his rain. But there are dark and chilling days, when much that was assured seems lost again. There are discouragements from the North as well as helps from the South. We would fain measure the progress of our spiritual life and, at the first glance, it seems immeasurably small. God's work is proceeding, but it is not going on by leaps and bounds and when we stop to watch it it seems to stop. We can no more say that we have seen character expanding than we can say that we have seen the lengthening of blades of grass, or of leaves upon the tree that a week ago was bare and now begins to shelter us when the sun is hot.

Three qualities are present in God's dealing with a human soul—patience, persistence, assurance of attainment. He will not hurry; he is never disheartened; he sees the end from the beginning. It is not to his vision that the progress of our spirits seems to halt, but to our own. It is not he that interrupts growth of the processes of good with questions; it is never he who doubts the completion of the task.

What is needed for the springtide growth of regenerated souls toward summer's fruitfulness is patience to co-operate with God's long patience, love to meet and use his love, and faith to grasp the end from the beginning. We are not to be considering our own progress, but God's will. We are not to weigh duty as an overwhelming mass to be lifted all at once. Duties, not duty, are set for our undertaking, and with each the strength of God is sure to be provided. Looking back to yesterday we can hardly see that spring has made advances. Looking back to yesterday we can hardly dare to think that we have grown in faith and grace. But the Lord of the harvest is the helper of the feebleness of all our new beginnings, and, looking back with him, we shall some day see how he led us on to good.

WHERE MINISTERS ARE EDUCATED.

An interesting pamphlet has lately fallen into our hands entitled Christian and Secular Education. It presents carefully compiled tables showing the number of ministers graduated from State universities and from Christian colleges, and draws the conclusion that "if we are to have an educated ministry for our churches we must have Christian colleges." The author of this book is Rev. William B. Williams of Michigan, and it is evidently the fruit of years of careful investigation. Not all his readers will accept all his conclusions, but they offer fruit for serious thought. For example, he finds in thirty-six theological seminaries 1,529 graduates of 176 Christian colleges, and 107 graduates of twenty-six secular or State institutions. Though the Christian colleges average a much smaller number of students than the State colleges, the former sent out more than twice as many as the latter for each college to be ministers. The four State universities of Michigan, Wisconsin, Iowa and Minnesota have graduated from their departments of liberal arts 3,516 young men, of whom 270, one out of every thirteen, have studied for the ministry. In the same four States thirty-seven Christian colleges have graduated 4,877 male students, of whom 1,605, one out of every three, have studied for the ministry.

Other facts not brought out in this book have quite as serious bearing on the supply of ministers. Only about one-fourth of the preachers of the gospel in the United States who bear credentials of their various denominations are graduates of colleges. It would be interesting to know their antecedent history, and by what processes they have been fitted, if at all, for their professions. Spiritual gifts are the first requisite for a successful ministry. But the man who has them very rarely knows how to use them without a disciplined mind. The word of God is the sword of the Spirit in the hands of a pious man. But without a trained intellect it is usually a sword without a handle. There is at present not so much need of more ministers, as for such higher appreciation of those we have as ministers cannot gain without intellectual, as well as spiritual, superiority. Mr. Williams tells us that nearly one third of the Congregational ministers in Michigan and Wisconsin are English born, and that the proportion of English Methodist ministers n those States is still larger, that sixty-six of 155 Baptist ministers in Wisconsin are foreigners by birth, and that forty-seven of these are natives of continental Europe. A large proportion of them, we fear, cannot have had adequate preparation for the needs of American congregations.

The sources of supply for the ministry, the qualifications which need to be insisted on, and the methods of receiving candidates afford fruitful fields of investigation, and more thorough examination of these matters may result in largely strengthening the influence of the Christian Church.

ARE LABOR LEADERS VILLAINS?

Mr. F. Hopkinson Smith has been accused of grossly misrepresenting, in his latest novel—Tom Grogan—the average member of American labor unions. And certainly his recent misrepresentation of our missionaries in Turkey prepares those who know the exact facts there to question somewhat Mr. Smith's ability to describe anything accurately. If the American Trades Unionists whom Tom Grogan had to fight are typical, then Bishop Potter of New York, who has had more experience, perhaps, than any other clergyman in this country in acting as conciliator and arbitrator in contests between organized labor and capital, has been strangely blinded to the facts. For Bishop Potter, at a meeting of the Church Association for the Advancement of the Interests of Labor, held in New York last week, said his experience had taught him that the value of labor unions could not be overestimated; that if he were asked to say on which side, the labor union or the other, the better manners were displayed in trying ordeals, he would unhesitatingly say, by the followers of labor; that he has been astonished at the exceeding courtesy and forbearance of the labor leaders when opposed by arrogant and cruel opponents; and he admires "the noble openmindedness" of men who are shaping the destinies of labor in this country. Mr. Smith is a writer of fiction. Bishop Potter is an executive of rare ability, a man of affairs as well as a teacher and defender of the truth.

To be sure, there are dangerous men in the labor unions of the country, and now and then they gain a hearing, as they did at the meeting of the National Union of Textile Workers at Lawrence last week, even going so far there as to assail the national emblem and to denounce the militia system. But these men do not represent the rank and file, and they seldom fail to be openly rebuked. Thus Mr. O'Sullivan at Lawrence said splendidly:

> All that labor ever hoped for, all it can ever hope for, must be accomplished under the stars and stripes by peaceful revolution, by constitutional methods with due reverence to the constituted laws and due respect for the rights of capital. . . . The man who strikes at national sentiment is a foe, not a friend, of labor, and the cause that cannot win under the stars and stripes is not a just cause. . . . I am an iconoclast, but I recognize that the mighty mills that line the beautiful Merrimac are the foundation stones of this city of my birth, the city that I love and, should the day ever come when, driven by hunger or starvation, desperation or agitation, by repeated wrongdoing or misery, men should become insane enough to attempt to destroy those mills, I, for one, will rejoice that that armory will stand between these desperate men and their anarchical project. . . . Labor rights can be achieved by organization, by unity and by agitation, but that agitation must be orderly and lawful, the revolution must be peaceful, the methods manly, courageous, constitutional.

THE OUTLOOK IN CANADA.

It is unfortunate that the Manitoba school question will play so prominent a part in the coming election, June 23, of members of the Dominion Parliament, for there are several other important issues upon which it is desirable that the opinion of the electors should be expressed. In its way the Manitoba question is of importance. It involves a constitutional question of great nicety, but the number of people immediately concerned is comparatively small. There are not more than 20,000 Catholics in the Province of Manitoba, even including the Indians, and many of the Catholics are satisfied with the national school system established by the provincial government. It is doubtful, indeed, if there would have been any appeal to the Privy Council in London, or any demand for redress made upon the Dominion Government, if the Catholic priest had been a less active factor than he is in Canadian politics.

As it is the Manitoba school question will occupy a foremost place among the issues of the election, and will overshadow other questions of much greater importance to the material prosperity and the healthy political life of the Dominion. The Conservatives have been in power at Ottawa since 1878. There have been several ministries since that time and three premiers since the death of Sir John Macdonald, but the policy of the present government differs little from that of the government which in 1879 committed Canada to the national policy and to the high protective tariff. The Tories have had possession of power without a break since 1878; the Liberals, in fact, have been in office for only four years since confederation in 1867, and no unprejudiced observer of Canadian affairs can overlook the fact that in Dominion politics Canada is suffering from the ills which seem necessarily to attend a long and unbroken continuance of power in the hands of one political party.

The Canadian people are acutely divided on the tariff. Yet never since the protective tariff came into operation have the Canadian electors had a really fair chance of expressing their opinion on it at the polls. No one now denies the gerrymander of 1882. The "hiving of the Grits" which then took place was obviously in the interests of government candidates, and was so flagrant that the churches in their annual conferences protested against its dishonesty. For eighteen years all the offices in the outside civil service and many of those in the state departments in Ottawa have gone to political partisans. The wonder is that the Liberal party has held together as it has done, and, after eighteen years of opposition, can still muster eighty members in the Dominion House of Commons. In English-speaking countries Liberalism has never existed under more discouraging conditions since the days of the French Revolution, when Liberalism in England was crushed and dragooned out of existence and the political boss in England and Scotland was supreme.

The Liberals, on the platform on which they are going to the electors, arraign the tariff policy of the Conservatives. They point to the numerically stationary character of the population of Canada, notwithstanding the energetic immigration policy of the last twenty years; to the constant stream of Canadians into the United States; and maintain that the Dominion has not yet entered upon the enjoyment of that increased prosperity which was confidently foreshadowed in 1879, and for some years afterwards, by the late Sir John Macdonald and the other official supporters of the national policy. They point also to the corruption in Dominion politics which has resulted from the protective tariff. They do not advocate free trade. That is not possible in a country with a financial system and an enormous public debt like those of Canada. What they advocate is an immediate revision of the tariff and an abandonment of its protective features. The Liberals also demand the abolition of the Senate, which is the most useless legislative chamber in the world. Its members are appointed by the government. At the present time seven-tenths of them are the nominees of the various Conservative ministries which have been in power since 1878. The Liberals condemn the Dominion Franchise Act of 1885 and demand a reform of the enormously expensive method of compiling the lists of voters. They also severely criticise the policy of the Conservative government in regard to public works and immigration. Canada is spending $200,000 a year on immigration. After the revelations of the last census the Liberals hold that there should be an overhauling of the immigration department and a careful revision of its agencies and methods.

THE SIN OF WORRYING.

This is one of the commonest of sins. It also is one of the most reprehensible. Many to whom gross temptations present no attractions yield to this one almost without a struggle. It is wholly unreasonable and, when allowed to become a habit, it is full of torment. It spoils one's own peace and renders one a source of continual distress and annoyance to others.

Worrying is fretting because matters have gone wrong or are supposed to be destined to go wrong. If the former be true, worrying does no good, even when we are conscious of having been in fault. Go to work bravely and remedy what is amiss, so far as possible, and what cannot be remedied bear with Christian patience and courage. If the latter be true, do not assume that the threatening evil must befall but do your best to prevent or lessen it, and remember that God allows evil as well as good to happen, that seeming evil often results in blessing, and that, should the worst come, probably in time you will find reason to thank God for it.

No one has any right to throw the doubt upon the divine wisdom and goodness which worrying involves. No one may rightly depress and discourage others thus. Worrying is distrusting God. It is refusing to believe that his promises are true and that his power is invincible. It is peculiarly dangerous and disheartening because it finds such a field in the realm of little things. It promotes peevishness, suspicion and needless fault-finding. It warps one's sense of moral proportion, making light of serious things and magnifying molehills into mountains.

Cheerfulness is as truly a Christian duty as truthfulness and worrying undermines both. Let us trust in God and fear not. Cultivate hopefulness and the worries of life will take on a less formidable aspect or will vanish altogether.

CURRENT HISTORY.

Waning Respect for Legislatures.

That people are losing respect for and confidence in our State legislatures as well as Congress no one who mingles among men or reads public journals can reasonably doubt. Nor can the ominous significance of this, if it be a fact, be overestimated. The high esteem in which the legislature of the commonwealth of Massachusetts has been held throughout the Union because of its character, ability and willingness to adopt progressive legislation is well known. Now while there is no such feeling of dissatisfaction here as yet compared with the feeling in Ohio and New York respecting their recent legislatures, yet it must be conceded that Governor Wolcott's vetoes have served to call attention to the haste with which our legislators are acting on important matters, and have compelled men to question the motives that control in passing not a few laws. Such a somersault as the House of Representatives turned after Governor Wolcott's veto of the Lowell Church Bill does not conduce to respect for the legislative branch of the government. No argument that Governor Wolcott set forth in his able veto was not before the legislators when they were considering the bill. If they voted for it as a matter of principle originally, principle should have governed them in their vote after the veto. At all times it must be insisted that the House is a deliberative body, and that any course of driving business through hastily which prevents the sober exercise of reason upon every measure which is pending is an injury to the State and is to be watchfully resisted by the members, no matter from what source the impulse to be hasty comes. The honor of Massachusetts is at stake in its legislature. The record of legislatures in other States may be improved by a good example set here. By all the force of their oaths of office, by their devotion to the interests of the people whom they have sworn to serve and by regard to their own fair fame, the legislature ought to be careful to preserve its reputation as a deliberative body and as the trustworthy guardian of the interests of the people.

Municipal Reform.

The attendance on and the interest developed at the second annual meeting of the National Municipal League, held in Baltimore last week, indicate that there is no falling off in public interest in this reform movement. The number and caliber of the men present from all parts of the country who spoke and read papers in which various aspects of the problem were discussed prove this. But more convincing was the statement in which the secretary of the league, reviewing the work of the past year, showed that the number of leagues throughout the country (267) has increased 65 per cent. during the year, the gain in the North Atlantic group of States, since 1894, being 451 per cent. In the South Atlantic States there were only two leagues in 1894, both to be found in one city; in 1895 there were thirteen and in 1896 seventeen in five States. The number of leagues in the northern Central States has increased from fourteen in 1894 to seventy eight in 1896. The southern Central States in 1894 were without a league, now they have fifteen. In the West in 1895 there were twenty-three, now there are thirty-six, and how direct and strategic the work of many of these Western leagues is may be inferred from the following notice, recently posted in the city of Portland, Ore.:

GAMBLING NOTICE.

The gambling houses being closed and fair warning having been given, notice is given:
To owners. That they must not allow their premises to be used for gambling purposes. Protestations of ignorance will not henceforth be received.
To frequenters. That lists of names will be kept and made public and reports made to employers.
To officers. That they will be expected to keep out of partnership with public gamblers.
The league has a large amount of accurate information at present and proposes to keep itself fully informed in the future.

THOMAS N. STRONG,
Pres. Municipal League.

A Non-partisan Corps of Federal Officials.

At a time when legislative incapacity—or worse—is attracting the attention of those most deeply interested in the purity and perpetuity of representative government, it is refreshing to see an executive—none the less representative because an executive—showing by his vigor and breadth an example to legislators worthy of their emulation. It is both futile and unnecessary to speculate how long it would have been before Congress, if it had been left to it, would have risen to the altitude of patriotism necessary to transfer 30,000 office holders from the unclassified to the classified list, for President Cleveland did it last week with one sweep of his pen. As it is, the next President of the United States will have only about 775 offices left which he can fill, so far reaching is this immense stride toward a non-partisan Civil Service. Contrast this with the situation even so late as when President Garfield was inaugurated, when 50,000 offices were at the disposal of the spoilsmen. The order of May 6 increases the number of classified positions from 55,736 to 84,763, and affects all federal employés except cashiers in the customs, postal and internal revenue service, Indians employed in minor capacities in the Indian service, a few private secretaries and confidential clerks, fourth class postmasters, laborers and our representatives abroad. The Civil Service Commission has recommended that fourth class postmasters and laborers be added to the classified list, and it is probable that before Mr. Cleveland's administration closes he will accept the commission's suggestion. There is far less criticism of the Executive's action by politicians and congressmen than would have been predicted ten years ago.

The X Rays.

Interest in the study of the X, or Röntgen, rays continues in scientific circles, with some interesting advances in knowledge. On the theoretical side there is no agreement as yet either upon the real nature or relations of the rays. One opinion is that they are longitudinal waves of the ether, another that they are ultra-violet rays of light, a third, and perhaps the most strongly supported, that they are streams of matter very finely divided and projected outward from the tube under high electrical impulse. Unlike light, they are not reflected or refracted (though one or two of the investigators claim to have found evidences of partial reflection from surfaces of platinum, or mercury), but they show many similarities to ultra-violet light in chemical effects and their relations to fluorescence. One of the interesting experiments has been that of exposing several thicknesses of sensitized paper over the photographic plate, a picture being produced on all the layers of paper as well as the plate, showing that the chemical power of the rays was not exhausted in penetration. Shadowgraphs, sciographs, cathodographs, radiographs (all these names are in use) have enabled investigators to pretty fully define the penetrative power of the rays, which seems to depend upon the atomic weight of the opposing material. The light metals are nearly transparent and the heavy ones opaque. A diamond was found to be opaque where a layer of black carbon was nearly transparent, and many other curious differences have been discovered, some of them with a probability of usefulness, as in the case of false gems. The text of a sealed letter written in mineral ink was visible where in vegetable ink it did not appear. The use of the discovery in medical diagnosis has steadily widened and promises to be of the greatest value in the location and study of morbid conditions of the body. By use of its chemical power upon fluorescent substances it has proved possible to throw shadowgraphs upon a screen, so that attendants at medical lectures have been shown the shadow of parts of their own bony structure. In regard to the direct medical effect of the rays in killing germs in the living body, Dr. Morton of New York speaks a word of caution to the effect that killing germs in test tubes is a different matter from destroying them in the living cells of the body, where any agent strong enough to kill the germs would be likely to kill the cells also.

Prohibition in Canada.

The British Privy Council in its decision, rendered last week, on the appeal of the Province of Ontario against the Dominion of Canada in a case raising the question of the power of provincial legislatures to make prohibitory liquor laws, seems to have evaded facing the issue, and, as in the Manitoba school case, it throws the responsibility for settling the problem back on Canada, the decree being in the form of an answer to certain academic questions propounded by the governor-general of Canada rather than a judicial opinion on points of law at stake. The prohibitionists, however, will gain comfort from the statement that, in the absence of conflicting legislation by the Dominion Parliament, the provincial legislatures have jurisdiction if it is shown that the manufacture of liquors is carried on under such conditions as to make its prohibition merely a local matter.

The Briton versus the Boer.

Sir Cecil Rhodes is still at the head of the British South Africa Company and apparently intends to remain there. While it is true that Mr. Chamberlain said last week in Parliament that it is the intention of the government to thoroughly investigate the whole subject of the relation between the British South Africa Company and the Jameson raid and its responsibility for the conspiracy against the Transvaal, yet the opinion prevails in London that public sentiment will have to be much more insistent than it is now before Mr. Chamberlain and his fellow-ministers will proceed in anything but a half-hearted way to expose Great Britain's shame. The directors of the chartered company are divided as to the wisdom or necessity of demanding Sir Cecil Rhodes's resignation, the cabinet are not more unanimous, and it is left for Sir William Vernon Harcourt, the Liberal leader of the House, and a Radical like Henry Labouchere to voice the indignation of many and say, as Sir Vernon Harcourt did last week, that the story of the raid is "an inexpressibly revolting, sordid and squalid picture of stock-jobbing imperialism." Of course, anything that the leader of the opposition says is subjected, justly or unjustly, to discount because of partisanship. But The Economist, representing sound British finance, is quite as outspoken in its denunciation of Mr. Rhodes, the South Africa Company and all other forms of what it is pleased to call "chartered libertinism," and there is some reason for hoping that ere long the best instincts of the English people will assert themselves, and that they will put an end to schemes for enlarging the British Empire and adding to imperial responsibilities through powerful corporations, whose officials care more for personal aggrandizement than they do for the peace of the world or Britain's real glory. Meanwhile the Dutch in South Africa are drawing closer together and preparing for a desperate contest at arms if it seems the only way to preserve the personal rights and political autonomy which they naturally cherish.

Spain, Cuba and the United States.

The Liberals of Spain are preparing to protest in the Cortes against the continuance of the attempt which Spain has been making for so long a time, and with such disastrous results to herself, to suppress the revolution in Cuba. The capture last week of a filibustering party near the Cuban coast in which there were two American citizens, one Englishman and two Cubans, their summary trial and sentence to death by a court martial in Havana, despite the protest of the consul-general of the United States, who insisted that they must be given a fair trial, brought Spain and the United States nearer a point of collision last week than they have been since the Virginius affair.

President Cleveland, through Secretary Olney, and Great Britain, through its Foreign Office, brought pressure to bear on Spain which prevented the immediate execution of the sentence and caused orders to proceed from Madrid that the verdict of the Havana court martial should be revised by the Supreme Council of the Spanish army and navy. All that we demand is that our citizens shall be given a fair trial in accord with principles of international law, and if Spain refuses that then it is apparent that President Cleveland intends to act with vigor.

NOTES.

A Senate committee is to investigate the details of the recent national bond sales.

A wholesale massacre of traders and Church of England missionaries in Micronesia at the Islands of the Manning Straits is reported.

The Bulfinch front of the Massachusetts State House will not be ordered destroyed by this legislature. So much seems to be certain.

French has recently been substituted for English as the language in which the Corps Diplomatique in Peking carry on official intercourse with the Chinese, a straw showing the waning prestige of Great Britain and the waxing power of Russia and her allies. China paid $40,000,000 of indemnity to Japan last week.

Great Britain's population has increased nineteen per cent., and her revenue sixteen and three-quarters per cent., during the past twenty years, but her expenditure has increased sixty-eight per cent. during the same period. How long can such disparity last and her prosperity be more than superficial and seeming?

California, Michigan and Indiana Republicans have declared in favor of Mr. McKinley. The California platform favors free coinage of silver. The Michigan platform a reiteration of the '92 straddle, and the Indiana a gold standard. Tennessee Democrats elected silver men and New Jersey Democrats gold men to the Chicago Convention.

The Supreme Court of California has just declared unconstitutional a law closing the barber shops at noon on Sundays and holidays. The court holds that "no reason can be given why the followers of one employment and no other should be debarred from the right to labor at certain times; that a law singling out one class and putting it under a criminal ban is not only unjust and unreasonable, but marks an invasion of individual liberty, the liberty of free labor which it pretends to protect." The Supreme Court of New York has just declared a similar law constitutional.

The departed and unlamented legislature of the State of New York seems to have capped the climax of absurdity in legislation. Both houses passed a bill enacting that all truckmen in the city of New York should be licensed to stand in the street in front of their homes all night, and that the commissioner of street cleaning should remove all vehicles of every description that he might find there after eight o'clock in the morning. The bill was drawn by a New York politician known as "Dry Dollar Sullivan," and not one legislator seems to have read it And yet we hear men talk about the tyranny of the veto power!

An Arkansas judge of the United States Circuit Court recently cited the Scriptural saying, "The wicked flee when no man pursueth, but the righteous are bold as a lion," as good authority why a jury should consider that flight was a silent admission of guilt, and the jury, for this and other reasons, rendered a verdict of guilty against a man who shot another who was entering his house at midnight and later fled the jurisdiction of the court. The Supreme Court of the United States has just reversed the decision of the Circuit Court, and Justice Brown, in rendering the decision, commented thus upon the Scriptural maxim: "As a Scriptural maxim it is sound, but as a legal proposition it is subject to so many exceptions that it cannot be considered sound law to be given to a jury for its guidance."

IN BRIEF.

A recent visitor to our sanctum was a subscriber who receives his mail but once a year. Such is one of the disadvantages of life in Alaska, but all the disadvantages pale when compared with the glory of the privilege of teaching the gospel to those who know it not.

Three dime novel readers met a stern but just fate in New York last week. Found guilty of derailing a railway train and causing the death of two men, the ringleader was sentenced to prison for life, and his associates will each abide in the same place forty years.

A correspondent writes to a contemporary that the members have been "renervating the church." Had there not been a subsequent allusion to the relation of cleanliness to godliness many a discouraged pastor might have sent inquiries to his brother on this field to learn the exact process of renerving the workers.

The janitors of Boston have arranged for a series of lectures by experts on such subjects as Ventilation and Sanitary Plumbing, Requirements of the License Law, Care and Management of Steam Boilers, etc. Very like Boston, and suggestive, too. Let a similar spirit of professional pride infect sextons. Let papers be read on How to Heat and Ventilate a Church, Why Fresh Air Is an Ally of Sound Doctrine, etc.

It is apparent from many communications which we have had from Madison, Ct., that the recent council there has failed to harmonize the warring elements of that church, nor has it convinced the opponents of Mr. Brown that he is orthodox. The exhortation of the council that mutual confidence and forbearance be exercised seems to have had little effect, judging from the tone of the communications that come to us.

Music is a bond of union among the Germanic peoples. Great Britain, Germany and America sing their different national hymns to the same air, as was amusingly shown by a story which a correspondent of the Boston Pilot tells of the recent meeting of William of Germany and Humbert of Italy. An Englishwoman in the crowd, hearing the continual repetition of the air of the German national anthem (which we call America and the British God Save the Queen), was heard to remark, "How sweet of them at such a moment to remember his grandmother."

The Sheats Law which Florida is enforcing against educational institutions supported by Northern churches and people who refuse to draw caste or racial lines affects the Methodist Episcopal Church North as well as us, and the General Conference, in session at Cleveland last week, adopted a resolution denouncing the law, and authorizing the denominational authorities to join the A. M. A. in testing its constitutionality. The Orange Park A. M. A. school had to close May 4 as the teachers were re-threatened with arrest and it was impossible to secure bail for successive arrests.

The question of the "Continental Sabbath" comes up on the Continent itself in the recent action of the French Chamber in voting for a day of weekly rest during the exhibition of 1900, but refusing to fix upon Sunday as that day. It meets the authorities of Yale through an invitation to the crew which is to row at Henley to take part in a regatta at Hamburg, which is to be rowed on Sunday. We hope that America at Paris will join England in closing its exhibits on Sunday, and that Yale will decline to row on the Elbe on that day. Much of the validity and efficiency of the weekly rest depends upon a common acceptance of a single day.

The adult class in the Sunday school may be brought together and held together in various ways. Professor Wood, in another column, gives his ideas on the subject. Rev. Dr. E. N. Packard of Syracuse has been wide-awake and progressive enough to secure Prof. John R. Commons of Syracuse University as teacher of a class in the Plymouth Church Sunday school, where social problems will be viewed from the ethical and religious standpoint, and freely discussed. Professor Commons the first Sunday, in outlining the work of the class, took up the liquor question and the Raines Bill, and announced that he had made arrangements at the City Central Library to have a special table set apart for books which the class could consult during the week.

One sentence in Professor Wood's suggestive article on The Adult Class and the New Bible may be misunderstood. "The new Bible," he says, "cannot be directly preached from the pulpit." If this were true in the strict sense of the words it would be bad for the new Bible—or for the pulpit. But it is quite true in the sense that the criticism of the Old Testament is still unsettled, and that the pulpit is no place for controversy. Certainly no minister of Christ can preach one thing while he believes another, and the shaking of confidence in the congregation will be less if at the proper time the preacher states his views without controversy than if he conceals them. Fortunately Christ is so prefigured in the Old Testament and revealed in the New that he who preaches from the Bible honestly can hardly help preaching Christ.

A correspondent takes us to task in a kindly letter because, in connection with the Vrooman case, we spoke of the Presbyterian fold as a walled garden and warned Congregational ministers to gain some idea of the width of the gate before seeking to enter. Our correspondent misunderstands us. We had no thought of twitting our friends the Presbyterians, but spoke in sober earnestness of warning. The man who seeks to enter club or church should know beforehand the requirements which will be made of him. The Presbyterian Church, while its requirement is of the slightest for its laymen, has a confession of faith which for nearly a quarter of a millennium has been used as a test for its teaching elders. To seek admittance without having examined that confession—as Mr. Vrooman seems to have done—seems to us warranted by neither courtesy nor prudence.

The controversy in the Methodist Episcopal General Conference over the admission of women as lay delegates has ended in a compromise which passed the General Conference by a vote of 425 to 98. The women who were elected are suffered to retain their seats subject to the challenge of their right which has been made and without establishing a precedent; the power of the conference to interpret the constitution is conceded, but is not on this occasion to be exercised; and an amendment expressly admitting the women was adopted by much more than a two-thirds vote and goes at once to the conferences where it is nearly sure of a three-fourths vote. As the women had already withdrawn of their own motion this clears the way for business. Signs multiply that the conference is not to go by without discussion of the "monarchical constitution" of the church, which is essentially a self-perpetuating close corporation.

Dr. Whitsitt of the Louisville Southern Baptist Theological Seminary is the author of the article on the Baptists in the new edition of Johnson's Cyclopedia. Having convinced himself as early as 1877 that the English Baptists practiced sprinkling or pouring prior to 1641, a thesis developed by Dr. Dexter in his John Smith Se-Baptist, and that Roger Williams and his company were so baptized, he stated his conclusions in the article. Naturally enough the matter has stirred a commotion in the denomination. And yet, as he says in a later defense, the conclusions are not new and have been accepted by the best scholars (except in the matter of the mode of Roger Williams's baptism, which is still in dispute). As intelligent Baptists do not, so far as we know, anywhere claim an apostolic succession of immersions, we cannot see that there is any occasion for heat in discussing the question.

Strongly as the late Dr. Alden felt on matters connected with the American Board, he left it with no sting in his letter of resignation, and, reports to the contrary notwithstanding, continued his interest in it to the close of his life. About three months ago a gentleman who had heard that Dr. Alden had stopped his contributions to the American Board wrote expressing his sorrow and asking if it were true. Dr. Alden replied that he had that very week made a contribution to the mission work of the Board and expected to keep it up. He protested that the letter must have been meant for another man unknown to him, and said: "I do not know the person to whom you refer in your letter. I know a man whose sympathies and prayers and contributions are continuous and earnest for the loved work to which you allude, and who is happy as a lark all the day and all the night in the enjoyment of the privilege and who expects to enjoy it to the end of earth, and, if the way is opened, as I think in some way it will be, beyond earth." Dr. Alden's will has just been probated. After providing for his widow and making a few bequests to relatives, he left his house in Boston to the American Board for the use of the Madura Mission. The greater part of the remaining property is left to ten residuary legatees, Amherst and Iowa Colleges, Hartford, Oberlin and Chicago Theological Seminaries, the City Missionary Society of Boston, American Board, the Home Missionary Society, the American Missionary Association and the Congregational Education Society.

There are few who will challenge the opinion that the greatest living preacher and expositor of the Bible is Dr. Alexander Maclaren of Manchester, Eng. At a recent banquet given in his honor by representative clergymen of the Free churches of England he laid bare his heart and revealed to those who sat around him some of the secrets of his successful ministry. After paying his tribute to the influence that Coleridge, Wordsworth, Carlyle and Emerson had in furnishing him with wholesome food—"wholesomer," he thinks, "than some that young clergymen are getting today"—after recording his indebtedness to his college and his favorite instructor, he proceeded to remark that he thanked God that he "was stuck down in a quiet little obscure corner" in which to begin his ministry. "For," said he, "that's what spoils half of you young fellows—that you get pitchforked into prominent positions all at once and then fritter yourselves away in all manner of little engagements that you call duties, going to this tea meeting, to that anniversary and to t'other breakfast celebration, instead of staying at home and reading your Bibles and getting near God. I thank God for the early days of struggle and obscurity." If the many young men just graduating from theological seminaries could only believe as Dr. Maclaren does! Dr. Joseph Parker said a suggestive thing in his humorous way at this banquet. "I have always distinctly, vividly, luminously," he said, "seen the divine hand in all the providential arrangements which have been in accordance with my own wishes." This is what the lower order of faith sees, the higher finds God's hand in trouble also.

STAFF CORRESPONDENCE.

FROM WASHINGTON.

The British Ambassador and the Brahman Deaf Mute.

The most impressive part of the Presentation Day exercises at Gallaudet College this year was the address of Jamini Nath Banerji and the episode that followed. President Gallaudet introduced the gentleman as a resident of Calcutta, India, who had dedicated his life to the service of the deaf in his native country. Finding the need of special instruction in such a profession, he had come to America and taken the normal course at this college. In doing this he had lost his caste. Jamini Nath Banerji made a fine appearance and spoke easily and well. He quite won his audience by the pleasant things he said of America, but did not omit his own government. He gave full credit for liberty of speech and for great advance and enlightenment in India under British rule. He hoped the time would come when provision would be made in his land for the unfortunate classes. There are no institutions for the blind or for the feeble-minded, and but two for the deaf. These are small, without government aid. Were the deaf provided for in the same proportion as they are in this country, there would today be 450 schools for them in India.

As he sat down Sir Julian Pauncefote, the tall, well-set up, iron gray, ruddy faced, pompous, typical Britisher, stood up and with great feeling expressed his gratification that a British subject should have been given the privileges of this institution. He paid a high tribute to its work and shook the swarthy young East Indian Brahman warmly by the hand. There were tears in his own eyes as he sat down, and his face was crimson from the effort that had fairly taken him out of himself. He had declined an invitation from President Gallaudet to make a speech, saying that it was not his custom. While this country has heard much of the speeches made by the American ambassador in Great Britain, it has never been edified by reports of speeches made by the British ambassador here. Those few words spoken at Kendall Green by her Majesty's representative will never cause a vote of censure in the houses of Parliament, and those who heard them will not soon forget his evident sincerity in expressing his cordial admiration of an American institution.

On successive anniversaries of this institution many distinguished guests have been present. President Garfield was always an honored friend, and today his marble bust was wreathed in smilax. Cabinet officers, justices, senators and congressmen have often been there, but the graduates of 1896 will always recall that on their Commencement day they were complimented by the presence of ex-Secretary of State John W. Foster; Hon. A. R. Spofford, librarian of Congress; Hon. W. T. Harris, commissioner of education; Rev. Dr. J. E. Rankin of Howard University; Rev. Dr. D. L. Whitman of Columbian University; Bishop Keane of the Catholic University; Rev. Dr. Thomas Gallaudet of New York city; Rev. Dr. S. M. Newman of this city; several members of the Chinese legation, and the British ambassador.

FROM THE INTERIOR.

Annual Meeting of the Chicago Association.

The forty-third annual meeting of this association, which now embraces about one-third of all the churches in the State, met Tuesday, May 5, with the Green Street Church, near Fifty-Sixth Street. The church is one of many helped into existence by the City Missionary Society. It is now able to provide for itself. It has an excellent location in the midst of a prosperous and growing community, near one of the boulevards on the South Side, has paid for its neat and commodious house of worship, owns land held in trust by the missionary society on which the permanent edifice will sometime be erected, has a flourishing Sunday school, a stirring pastor and members who are not afraid of hard work.

The attendance at the association was nearly 200, the largest in its history. Three young men who had studied in the university were licensed for a year. Five ministers belonging to other denominations but serving our churches applied for admission. A good many ministers of our own denomination were present who desire settlement in the vicinity. Rev. F. T. Lee of the Douglass Park Church was moderator and Rev. Messrs. Armstrong and Stone served as scribes.

In answer to the question, When and to What Objects Should Our Churches Contribute? all who spoke seemed to be of one mind, viz.: to the objects to the support of which our churches stand pledged. The speakers, Rev. W. F. McMillen and Rev. J. B. Silcox, felt that one of the ways in which this is to be brought about is by persistently refusing to allow other objects than those known as the great benevolences to be presented in our pulpits, and by faithful instruction on the part of the pastor as to the work these benevolences seek to accomplish. The second question, Is the Social Settlement the Church at Work? was answered in the affirmative by Rev. E. A. Adams of the Bohemian Mission and Rev. H. A. Bushnell of La Grange. This question brought out a good deal of discussion. Nearly all who spoke seemed heartily to approve of "the settlement" and to believe that its work is the work of the church, but all were careful to assert their unwavering loyalty to the church. It seemed also to be assumed by most of the speakers that these settlements are doing their work in the name of the church, and that those who manage them openly avow their interest in the church, or at any rate profess themselves to be Christians. Few in our fellowship would countenance any of the attacks which some have made on the church as an institution, or even criticise it, save in the hope of leading it out into larger activities. Yet no one answered the question, why it is that so many advocates of the social settlement have been so bitter against the church and have brought so many accusations against it. The assertion of the Chicago Commons that it is a Christian institution intimately connected with the Tabernacle Church, in its immediate vicinity, may have a favorable influence on some other settlements which have not felt themselves ready to make such an avowal.

Prof. Graham Taylor, in speaking on the question, What can we learn from the Roman Catholic Church? confined himself to a discussion of the methods employed to reach people, to become acquainted with their personal history and to exert personal influence upon them. In these particulars, as well as in the care with which they educate and influence the young, he thought the Roman Catholic church far in advance of the Protestant.

Vacation Schools.

Leading citizens connected with the Civic Federation are exerting themselves to establish half a dozen schools during the summer vacation for the children who live in the most crowded districts of the city, and for whom no summer outing is possible. A request has been sent to the Board of Education for the use of as many of their schoolhouses as may be necessary, and the hope is that the results of the experiment will be such as to warrant the city itself in keeping up such schools through the summer heats. It is proposed to have a three hours' session each day, and to make this session so attractive through a variety of exercises and a wide deviation from the cut and dried method of the ordinary school as to render it pleasanter for the pupil to be in the schoolroom than on the street. If the plan succeeds it will tend to diminish crime and to keep thousands of pupils from being thoroughly demoralized by the long vacation.

A New Library Building at McCormick Seminary.

McCormick Theological Seminary (Presbyterian) has been fortunate in its patrons. The family from which it derives its name has endowed it richly and its members, even of the second generation, seem as deeply interested in enlarging its equipment as those of the first. Wednesday evening, May 6, a new building, costing about $120,000 and called the Virginia Library, after a daughter of the elder McCormick, was dedicated. The architecture is Grecian. The building has been modeled after the Erectheum at Athens. The ceremonies of dedication, in which many distinguished people took part, were held in the spacious reading-room, although the dedicatory address, by Rev. Dr. Howard Duffield of New York, was given in the seminary chapel. The building is beautiful and conveniently arranged and will be adequate for all demands for many years.

A Quarter Centennial.

It is pleasant in these days of frequent change to hear now and then of a man who is content to abide in one place a quarter of a century. This Prof. H. M. Whitney of Beloit has done. On the anniversary of his coming to the college, the president and faculty gave him and his wife a surprise by entering their house, filling the evening with pleasant reminiscences and leaving behind them a grateful souvenir in the shape of a beautiful picture. In an institution like Beloit, where the associations between the members of the faculty are so intimate, the addresses could not help being very tender and touching. The friends of Professor Whitney, although fully recognizing the hard work he has already done and the honorable part he had in helping prepare the Century Dictionary for the press, trust that he has many years of useful service for Beloit and the public before him.

FROM AUSTRALIA.

Christian Union.

At irregular intervals the question of the reunion of Christendom, which some time since seemed to fill the theologians' whole field of vision, continues to be discussed. Last month the moderator of the Presbyterian Assembly, Rev. A. M. Tait, in his inaugural address opened out an elaborate scheme of federal union amongst the Protestant denominations. It included a representative newspaper, plans for preventing the overlapping of Protestant churches in sparsely populated districts and sundry other things.

Methodist Union.

It is significant that the day after the unfolding of this general scheme of union by the Presbyterian moderator the Sydney Wesleyan Conference rejected a proposal for the consummation of Methodist union in 1901, and referred the question back to the constituencies of the several Methodist bodies. No one attacks Methodist union as "a pious opinion," but as a piece of practical legislation many are very chary of entertaining it. The Victorian Wesleyan Conference adopted a similar resolution to that of the Sydney Conference. Nevertheless the movement towards union has, on the whole, made progress of late years. In some of the colonies the sentiment in favor of union is more advanced than in Victoria and New South Wales.

The W. C. T. U.

This alert and useful society recently organized a deputation which waited upon the colonial secretary, Hon. N. Brunker, upon a matter about which social reformers in New South Wales have long been sorely exercised. The deputation urged the government to raise "the age of consent" for girls. It is now fixed at fourteen years, which is scandalously low. In this matter New South Wales is behind some of the other colonies. Mr. Brunker lent an attentive ear to the ladies who pleaded the cause of social purity. We may, therefore, hope that next session an attempt will be made by the Government to deal with the question, though whether the age should be raised to sixteen or to eighteen years is matter for difference of opinion amongst our reformers.

The Council of the Churches.

The day after the W. C. T. U. deputation came one from the Council of the Churches. This body is composed of lay and clerical representatives officially appointed by the highest ecclesiastical courts of the Presbyterians, Anglicans, Wesleyans, Primitive Methodists, Baptists and Congregationalists. Its sphere of action is confined to questions affecting the moral welfare of the community. They too pleaded for the raising of the age of consent. Also they asked the colonial secretary to administer inflexibly the law relating to lotteries, and to put down not only those who take bets on the streets, and those who run the gambling machine called "the totalizator," but also those who promote raffles at church bazars, and those who get off "distributions" of landed estate. Also they asked for an amendment of the law in relation to dancing saloons. These places now may be kept open—and sometimes are kept open—at all hours of the day and night, Sunday not excluded, and, unless some disturbance takes place in the street near them, the police have no power to enter them. Mr. Brunker gave this deputation, as he did that from the W. C. T. U., hopes of early legislation.

CURRENT THOUGHT.

AT HOME.

The Atlantic Monthly (May), in discussing two recent books dealing with Holy Scripture, says: "An impression easily obtained from the current Higher Criticism is that of all who have had to do with the Scripture documents the final redactor merits the scantiest regard. To the prevailing historic sense, so greedy for origins, he is almost necessarily a marplot, who will not let the primitive writings speak for themselves, but mixes them together in the most perplexing way or confuses their utterance with glosses of his own, and from this view it is but a step to regarding him as a bungler and dislocator, whose interference were better dispensed with. It is as if there had crept into Biblical study a kind of book fancier's craze for first editions, which latter, one suspects, are accounted all the more valuable for not revealing their inside, but remaining uncut. . . . Nor were the writings themselves, those immensely potent factors in the life and uplifting of the world, the mere Grub Street hackwork that all this talk of Jehovists and Eloists and priests' codes would seem to make them. Let it be proved by careful study of their form that they have crystallized into an organic literary creation, part answering to part, and one constructive idea controlling word and plan alike, and we have a fact of great significance to import into our critical study. The final editor becomes increasingly identified with the original creator, and the Bible is seen to have reached its acknowledged literary power by having an involution to balance its evolution. It was made according to the dictates of the literary sense, like a book, rather than those of the business sense, like a directory."

The Boston Transcript holds that "even under the most favorable circumstances the habit of short pastorates is cutting up, root and branch, what may be called the cumulative influence of clergymen. . . . It is now the country doctor, not the country minister, who is the confidential intimate and adviser of the people. He alone it is who now knows the antecedents of men and women, the history of their families, their inherited qualities, their record of trials and temptations, the skeletons in their closets. The clergyman, however able, has usually been for a year or two only in his parish; he has not yet got really behind the scenes; he knows nothing of the hereditary traits, the traditional obstacles. He has not the key to men's struggles; with the utmost official deference he is left, in a great degree, outside of their lives."

The Christian Register, representing Unitarian Congregationalism, expresses its dissent from such legislation as Governor Wolcott made ineffective when he vetoed the First Church, Lowell, Bill. "Without attempting to pass at all upon the merits of the difficulty between the church and the society, we believe that it is a dangerous precedent to carry church quarrels into the legislature. It would be much better to settle them by arbitration, and, if that cannot be done, by the courts."

ABROAD.

The London Chronicle, reviewing Dr. A. C. Fraser's Gifford Lectures on The Philosophy of Theism, says of the materialistic philosophy of life: "As most thinkers now recognize, it has only to be stated to be refuted. The system which was in its heyday when Professor Tyndall delivered his Belfast address is now as bankrupt as a system of thought can be; its bills are waste paper; except in death and despair it has nothing to offer to its forlorn creditors."

The Wesleyan Church census, just published in England, reveals a net loss of 2,275 members, and the Christian World advises the authorities in Methodism to recognize the significance of this fact, to study Wesley's life and see how swift he was to adapt organism to environment. "To worship Wesley's rules when the age has outgrown them is the exact opposite of following Wesley. . . . There are women in Methodism who could do as well (as those in the Salvation Army) if allowed. . . . If Methodism is to preserve a leading place as a religious force, it must, to a larger degree than now, allow its preachers and teachers the right which Wesley claimed and exercised—of unfettered thought and unfettered speech."

The Japan Mail reports a persistent increase in the tendency toward luxury among the Japanese, the chief cause being the passage of large sums of money into the hands of the middle and lower classes during the war, six million yen being transmitted through the post to the families of officers and men. The British minister, in a recent report on the foreign trade of Japan made to the British Foreign Office, said: "Commercial and industrial questions are now almost as popular subjects of treatment, both in the press and by public speakers, as the most urgent political questions, whether foreign or domestic. . . . When it is remembered that a single generation ago trade in any form was considered the most degrading of pursuits, and that all engaged in it were in the social scale the lowest of the low, the present spirit of the people seems not to be the least of the many great changes that have come over them." He also says that as the result of the provision of the Shimonoseki Treaty, securing to foreigners the right to establish factories in China, the golden visions of the Japanese that they would eventually control the yarn trade in China fade away.

The Andover of Today.

By Rollin Lynde Hartt.

THE town of Andover leaves an impression of square houses and solemn elms, of dignified red halls set wide apart, of commodious homes inseparably associated with the quaint old days, of streets thronged with Phillips boys in golfing suits, Abbot girls, two and two for their afternoon walk, and a few nondescript theologues from the barracks on "Zion's Hill."

Mr. Joseph Cook, in a delightful after-dinner speech, once alluded to Andover as "a hill on which there is a Greek fire on one altar and a Hebrew fire on another." He might have added some Roman candles, had he chosen to make the figure even more striking, but apparently he was not High Church enough for that. However, the altars have burned to good effect and their classic aroma has charged the air of Andover with a fine intellectuality for more than a hundred years. This could hardly be otherwise in a town where the former homes of Austin Phelps, Elizabeth Stuart Phelps Ward and Harriet Beecher Stowe are yet to be seen, where that great preacher and theologian, Edwards A. Park, is still living, where the national anthem was written by Dr. Smith, while a student in the seminary, and where the oldest classical school and the oldest theological school in the land have stood side by side with the oldest incorporated girls' school in New England. The faculties of the three institutions, with their families, have given Andover the tone of a university town. The influence of such men as Professor Park, Professor Phelps, President Smyth and Dr. Tucker has had most beneficial results.

PHILLIPS ACADEMY.

Furthermore, several active and progressive clubs have contributed to the intellectual life of the town. The November Club, with a membership wholly of women, is a little amateur university. Then there is in Andover a cosmopolitan spirit that broadens its life and influence. Students come from all parts of the country, and parents from distant States make Andover their home while educating their children; and, on the other hand, the town sends out its sympathies and energies to all the world. The Japanese Doshisha and the first tract, educational and temperance societies all trace their origin to Andover, while many thousands of lives spent in devoted labors for every brave cause owe to Andover their first strong motives of endeavor. So it seems to Andover people only the most natural thing to speak of "this hallowed hill," and there is a sweet quaintness in the words of the early founders who said they had given their money "for the virtuous and pious education of youth of genius and serious disposition."

Now that theological professors ride on bicycles, and the trolley cars from Lawrence run up and down Zion's Hill, it may properly be said that there is a new Andover. There is certainly a new Phillipian, a new theologue, even a new Abbot maid. Aside from various evidences of material progress, the town itself has not greatly changed. The same avenue of elms, with its Gothic arch and the lovely blue vista beyond, invites to the same delightful walk. The "old railroad" is even a little more deeply carpeted with pine needles than before, and the dark branches overhead almost wholly shut out the moonlight. Pomp's Pond has been robbed of much of its surrounding forest, but is just as good to swim in as it used to be; and the dim mountains—Wachusett, Monadnock and Kearsarge—are not less inconspicuous and not less romantic features of the landscape than in the days when O. W. Holmes and N. P. Willis recited Greek in "the classic hall," which, by the way, is today the most picturesque building in Andover. And yet a new and very different generation of young people has come to enjoy all these things.

ABBOT ACADEMY.

The academy, which now numbers 450, is practically a college. It has base ball and football teams that frequently defeat their visitors from Amherst, Bowdoin or Brown, and even "put up a strong game" against Yale and Harvard. The Phillips boys—"men" they call themselves—publish a weekly paper, a monthly magazine and an illustrated annual, support a glee club, and, despite considerable disapproval, have introduced three Greek letter fraternities. The course of study overlaps the college curriculum by about a year, so that a Phillips Senior is in a fair way to win Freshman prizes if he is plucky. And yet—with all the change at Phillips, the incoming of the throng of rich boys and the prevalence of fashionable extravagance—the hard-working, self supporting, ambitious, poor boy still has his place of honor. There are many of these brave lads in Andover, and they do much to sustain the moral tone of the school. They are worthy successors of good Dr. McLean, who, in his boyhood, walked all the way from the Mississippi River to go to school at Phillips Academy.

The present generation of divinity students sleep on the same macadamized beds that straightened the spines of those rectilinear theologians, who, in the early 'teens of this century, made Andover the home of sanctimony. There has been, nevertheless, a great change in the theologues since then. They are more like collegians now. The callow youth, in shiny Prince Albert and once immaculate white necktie, is happily obsolete—or at least obsolescent. A more normal type—with more knowledge of the world, more social adaptability and a sounder physique—has taken his place. There are, perhaps, fewer meditative walks in "Missionary Lane," but there is just as much genuine piety. The strong Christian fellowship among the men, the cordial relations between faculty and students, and the healthy tone of the seminary's religious life, together with the perfect quiet of the town, make Andover an ideal place for the pursuit of sacred studies.

At Abbot the most striking change is the retirement of Miss Philena McKeen, who has done more than any other one person to give the institution the high reputation it holds. She is spending her last years in the house which she has named Sunset Lodge, only a little distance from the school which will always hold her in dear remembrance. If the resignation of Miss McKeen was the greatest recent loss of Abbot Academy, its greatest recent gain is the acquisition of the beautiful Draper Hall, which is in many respects the finest building in Andover. As for the young ladies themselves—"femsems" the boys call them—they have for the most part forgotten the purpose of the institution's founder, i. e., to furnish wives for the theologues. Yet be it said to their honor that, although they have shown only a languid devotion to theological students of late, they have a reputation for devotion to foreign missions that few schools can equal.

This old New England town is fondly remembered by the many thousands of men and women who were educated here and who are scattered now to the very ends of the earth. This is why the first gun fired in celebration of Andover's 250th anniversary next week will—like the first shot fired at Concord fight—be "heard round the world."

THE ADULT CLASS AND THE NEW BIBLE.

BY PROF. IRVING F. WOOD, SMITH COLLEGE.

The noisy and "pressing" problems of the day are well-nigh shutting out the consideration of many silent and unobtrusive problems which are very often quite as important. One of these is the standing Sunday school problem—what shall be done with the adult class and especially with the men's class? Another is the less known but hardly less urgent problem of the Bible student—how shall we make the results of the newer Bible study the possession of the people at large?

One hardly needs to write of the perplexities of the first problem. Every Sunday school worker sees them. Now and then there is a most admirable adult class, but, candidly, are they in general a success? Do they usually draw, not in a vulgar, minstrel show way, but even in an honest, churchly way? Do the adult classes of the average Sunday school make a really respectable showing?

Before this problem can be settled there is need of the settlement of one or two principles. First, is the Sunday school the "nursery of the church" only? If it is, adult classes are out of place in it and the problem is easily solved. This would also solve another problem, that of graduation from the Sunday school. Of course, the boys and girls will graduate as soon as they begin to fancy themselves young people. It is right and proper they should. No one wants to stay in a nursery all his life. If, as seems often to be tacitly assumed, the Sunday school is only the place where the church is training its children, then in the name of common sense let us stop complaining because those who are not children do not want to go. If we want the adults, let us recognize the adult element in the Sunday school. For example, let us sometimes bring before the Sunday school what will interest adults in the results of scholarship or exploration as bearing on the lesson. Ten to one it will interest the children too.

Second, is it possible to make the adult class attractive unless it is worthy of the adult intellect? Let me draw a picture. Two seats full of men, half with gray hair, all with long years of ripe Christian experience, and to such men the succession of questions drawn from the Quarterly is as follows: "What was the subject of our last lesson?" "Where was Jesus when our lesson opens today?" "What did Jesus first say?" "What did his disciples reply?" "What did he then tell them to do?" "Did they immediately obey him?" etc. Is this picture a caricature? No. It is a photograph. It, or something approaching it, is too much the characteristic of many adult classes. They are often unworthy of the adult intellect. They apply methods for children to classes for grown persons, and, of course, without real success.

The second problem is a much more delicate and difficult one. A great deal of new knowledge has, in one way and another, come within the past generation to be the common possession of Bible scholars. There is so much of it that it makes the old Bible a new and a richer Bible. But, as yet, this knowledge has not penetrated very much outside the range of professional Biblical scholars. In fact, there is some popular prejudice against it. How many of the rank and file of Sunday school teachers, for example, would interpret Ecclesiastes to their classes as the production of a skeptical period in Israel's history long after Solomon's time? Yet every Bible scholar knows that to treat it as Solomon's is very much like talking to a class in physics about phlegiston. How can we best give this new Bible to the people at large?

The new Bible cannot be directly preached from the pulpit. Even the spiritual lessons that the pastor gets from his critical study cannot always be used there. This is not the dictum of the spirit of cowardice, but of wisdom. The magnificent heroism of the Maccabean times as reflected in Daniel might make a very helpful sermon, but is the pastor of the average church quite sure that, put it as carefully as he may, some one's confidence in the Bible will not be shaken by the suspicion that Daniel was not written at the very time the events are said to have taken place? There may be objections to any critical positions which will counterbalance very much of the good of the sermon.

Still less is the prayer meeting the place for such matters. People come to the prayer meeting—or ought to come to it—to really talk with God. It ought to be the most precious, helpful, spiritual service of the week. Anything which might in any one's mind terminate in mere discussion should be excluded as out of place.

Above all, the Sunday school as a whole is not the place for it. We might be glad to teach Gen. 2 and 3 as tradition, but if the children have been taught it as veritable history at home, we had better be careful. The time for overturning the ideas of the children is not yet. Happy are those children whose conceptions of the Bible never have to be overturned.

We have in the adult class the machinery already in existence for the study of the new Bible. We have mature minds, already familiar with the text of the Bible. They are well grounded in faith and there is little danger of any teaching overthrowing their confidence in the Bible. They are appreciative of spirituality. No one would dare to go to them with only the dry bones of criticism. New views must commend themselves by immediately bearing spiritual fruit. There is no place where the new Bible can so easily, safely and profitably be opened as in the adult Bible class. It has its reflex value, too, in helping to solve the problem of the Bible class.

But there are limitations. The most obvious is the limitation of leader. Who is to lead the class in their study of the new Bible? Only one who knows the new Bible. Of course it can often be the pastor. Sometimes it may be a layman, perhaps one whose study of natural science or history has led him to a new study of the Bible as the price of his own faith. In every case it should be one who has thought through, as well as read through, some at least of the problems presented. The new Bible is a very large Bible. An unprepared class with an unprepared leader might almost as well decide to conduct their future exercises in classical Hebrew as to "investigate" some of its profound and intricate problems on a Sunday morning's preparation.

But in the great number of cases where there is a demand for the study a leader is at hand. Then come certain requisites of spirit in the class. The first is the most hearty sympathy with views opposite to one's own. Not toleration but sympathy, which is far more Christian, is wanted, coupled with the utmost frankness in the statement of difficulties. If there is frankness it will probably be found that the widest variety of opinions will develop. The average class will illustrate the whole gamut of "conservative" and "liberal" notions, but amid all this diversity the truly Biblical class will keep "the unity of the spirit in the bond of peace." Growing from this is the necessity that the class should not strongly take sides. A Bible class is for information, not argument; for discussion, not browbeating. Very many things about the new Bible are not yet fully fixed. It will not do to assert them positively. The very conservative brother will be much more sympathetic of our view if we will show him all the strong and beautiful sides of his own view. In general, the study of the new Bible should not be to assert any one set of opinions, but to compare all, leaving each member of the class to take what best suits his own mental temperament.

Most of all is needed the spiritual element. The Bible is a religious book. Unless the new Bible is religious for us, it is shorn of its glory. It may do for a university class to devote all its thought to "problems" and "questions," but for a Bible class in a Christian church, never. We need not go out of our way to drag in lessons, but the result of critical study can and must be spiritual. This is the very reason why we urge a study of the new Bible. It has been a revelation of God to many. We desire that it should be to more.

The Springfield Republican denounces the habit which the local baseball club has of playing games on Sunday when away from Springfield. "No such thing is permitted here, and is it any more tolerable away from home?"

THE PRINCIPLE OF SABBATH OBSERVANCE.

BY REV. GEORGE A. TEWKSBURY.

The principle of Sabbath observance lies imbedded as a direct and easy inference in the statement of our Lord: "The Sabbath was made for man, and not man for the Sabbath." If this may suggest that the Sabbath was made for man as a whole, generically regarded, it also suggests that it was made for the whole of every man individually considered. Every man has a tripartite nature; he exists in three departments. Adopting Jeremiah's figure of a garden, we see in him three plots or beds—the physical, the intellectual, the spiritual.

These divisions do not lie horizontal within him, and artificially separate; but they rise terrace-like, one above another, representing an ascending scale of importance. As the central design of each, from below upward, the growing plants are made to form the words body, mind, soul, and the most important, giving the law to the others, is the soul. The body is not for itself, neither is the mind, but both are for the soul or the spiritual nature, and the soul is for God. One part is not to rob the others of their rights in the day. The body is to get rest in it, but the body is not to say: "Now Sunday is come; I will spend the day in sleep; I will not get up till ten or eleven o'clock"—too late to go to church —"I will take my ease and so get rested for another week's work." Nor is the mind to monopolize it to the exclusion of needful bodily rest and spiritual improvement. Nor, again, is the soul so to take it as to leave the body and mind unhelped in its return. The fair and full distribution of its good is to be secured. But as the spiritual is the highest, most important part of every man, the body and mind being subordinate and tributary to it, so all the benefits of the day to the body and mind are to accrue in the spiritual. The respite from worldly care, the interim of accustomed labor which the day marks and measures, is first and last to be turned toward the end of enabling one to give attention to those high and sacred concerns which lie on the divine side of his being; incidentally it will give its full measure of blessing to the mental and physical. "Seek ye first God's kingdom and his righteousness, and all these things shall be added unto you" The grand ultimate end of the Sabbath is the spiritual nature.

While other days are for body, mind and soul, this day is chiefly, as defined on an Assyrian tablet, "a day of rest for the heart." It is the window of the week, commanding a view of celestial landscapes. It is the perspective glass, to help the vision from the hill called Clear. A man in Newcastle, Eng., who had a house to let, took an applicant to the top of it and, speaking of the distant view it gave, added: "We can see Durham Cathedral on a Sunday." "On a Sunday," said the listener, "and, pray, why not on Monday?" "Because on the week days the great furnaces and pits are pouring forth their smoke and we cannot see so far, but when the fires are out our view is wide."

Here, then, is readily yielded to us the principle of Sabbath observance. It is found to be really a principle of affinity. Whatever will promote the great end of the day, or be as a glass in the hand whereby one may almost discover "the golden-spired apocalypse," the cathedral glories of heaven, may, self-evidently, come within its consecrated hours. Whatever will not do this is to be rigorously excluded. It is manifest upon the face of the matter that the fires of secular employment must be put out, their smoke no longer filling the air. Spiritual ends must be subserved by spiritual means. "Six days shalt thou labor and do all thy work." Will the spending of much of the day in sleep, will the bringing into it of social and convivial pleasures, will the studying of the week day lessons or exacting intellectual effort, will business letter writing or the making up of accounts, will bicycle riding, will Sunday newspapers, help forward the higher ends of the day? Only as they do may these things and a host of others like them be allowed. Confessedly it is not easy to see any more fitness in them for these ends than in a stick to discern the glories of the stars. But the principle is infallible and imperative. And every man is responsible so to apply the principle that the Sabbath as made for man may fulfill for him its blessed mission.

COMMENCEMENT AT OBERLIN SEMINARY.

A statement quite surprising to those present was made by ex-President Fairchild at the alumni tea on anniversary day. It was that sixty-two years ago on that very day of the month, May 7, in a small upstairs room the first students and teachers of Oberlin met for organization and the beginning of work. He was himself present as a young student and has been connected with the college either as student or teacher ever since. Although no effort had been made to observe this interesting anniversary, which happened to coincide with the seminary Commencement, the day was the most interesting of recent years. The graduating class was smaller than usual, but the attendance of alumni and friends from neighboring cities and towns was considerably larger than usual. The exercises of the day began with the celebration of the Lord's Supper by students and alumni in Council Hall Chapel at half-past ten in the forenoon. The brief remarks of President Ballantine and Professor Currier were exceedingly tender and impressive.

In the afternoon a large audience assembled in the Second Church to hear the Commencement address by Dr. Behrends of Brooklyn. His theme was The Mental Discipline of the Minister, and his presentation of it was compact and effective. It dealt with mental habits rather than technical training and was itself an illustration of the seven traits of thought which it enjoined. These seven traits, presented alliteratively for the sake of more ready remembrance, were clearness, concentration, continuity, courage, caution, comprehensiveness, constructiveness. After the address the degrees and diplomas were conferred upon and presented to the graduating classes by President Ballantine, with the appropriate words which always characterize him upon such occasions.

Between the afternoon and evening addresses the ladies of the First and Second Churches provided an alumni tea, which gave oppertunity for social reunion and some very happy after-supper speeches.

The last meeting of the day was the address before the alumni, delivered in the evening by Dr. C. W. Hiatt of the class of '85, pastor of the First Congregational Church in Peoria, Ill. Its theme was a justification of Christian missions. Dr. Hiatt has the reputation of being one of the most eloquent pulpit orators among the alumni and his address on this occasion amply sustained his reputation.

ARE THE MINISTERS TO BLAME?

In your issue of April 16 "Anxious Observer" speaks of the present straits of the Congregational ministry. He quotes, "Thirty applications for a little mission church, a large percentage from unworthy men," and in The Congregationalist of the 23d we have a word from the former pastor of this little church or a similar one.

The two articles suggest a serious problem, and one that calls for candid discussion in order to reach the best solution. We agree with much that is said in those articles. We gave up our charge in the belief that it was for the best interest of the Master's kingdom and that it was his will. We are advised next time to cling like the bur for the "half loaf."

The present writer, though "infantile in his innocence," is with the brother who wants to do something more than "mark time," and we are old-fashioned enough to trust the Lord to open the way into a new field. We know of men who have been two and three years trying to make "sure of another place," while they have given half-hearted service in trying to keep the machinery of the church running. If I cannot do anything more than "mark time" I will quit the ministry. Mr. Warren suggests that the ministry is overcrowded with unworthy men. Take the country at large we are told by good authority that the Congregational churches largely outnumber the clergy, although near Boston there is a congestion of the ministry.

Is the ministry wholly to blame for the "thirty candidates" or more? Judging from my late charge, the churches encourage it, for the committee selected as the first candidate one of whom they knew absolutely nothing beyond his simple request to supply as a candidate.

Again, most of these applicants have charges already. If my friend who has been "marking time" for three years, waiting for a call elsewhere, had resigned, and some other man in the same circumstances had done the same, each might have found in the field of the other the place for him to do his best work. If this "exchanging" can be brought about in some way it is better than "marking time" and keeping some other minister from the work to which the Lord may have called him, whatever log-rolling the churches and ministers may really resort to. We need, like Job, a daysman, and I believe our State Association has taken the right step in establishing our Congregational Bureau of Pastoral Supply, which will more and more demonstrate its value as the churches and ministers trust and support it.

PERHAPS ONE OF THE "THIRTY."

The town of Andover was founded 250 years ago, and its citizens, in view of its age and noble history, are planning to celebrate in a worthy way. So many of our readers have either studied at Andover or become interested in the town through reading the literature which has been created there that we have deemed it opportune to publish this week an illustrated article on the Andover of Today. Anticipating the town's jubilee the Free Christian Church last Sunday observed the fiftieth anniversary of its founding. Those who participated did well to call attention to the fact that the church was organized as a protest against human slavery. Its founders would not receive to its fellowship as members "slaveholders or apologists for slavery nor any who manufactured, sold or used intoxicating drinks." No minister of Andover gave the founders of the church a word of sympathy. The council which recognized the church met in a private house and included three ministers, one from Haverhill, one from Boston and one from the West. In due time the logic of events and the ordering of God changed the feeble, despised congregation to a strong and honored church. The pastor of the Old South Church was present last week, ostensibly to inquire what had become of a member of his own church who left it fifty years ago, but really to present a set of communion cups as a token of the love and fellowship of the Old South Church. Rev. E. Winchester Donald, rector of Trinity Church, Boston, son of the only active member surviving, said that if he had any Christian life or was doing any Christian service it was because he was nurtured in the Free Christian Church, and he alluded finely to the few people who gathered in its anti-slavery prayer meetings and actually "prayed slavery out of existence."

LIGHT.

BY GERTRUDE EDWARDS.

He giveth his beloved light—
A light so great, a light so bright,
It flashed upon my inner sight
And pierced the darkness of my night.
I woke and saw myself at last
So black with sin I shrank aghast.

A light so warm, a light so strong,
It melts the heart ice-bound so long,
And now the warm blood courses through
As if in one just born anew.
Then tender, new emotions rise,
And gentle tears unlock the eyes.

A light so radiant and so clear
I shuddered at the dangers near.
I saw the way that I had trod
Had only led me far from God.
So dark and poisoned was the air,
With here a pitfall, there a snare.

A light so pure, a light so bright,
I turned to flee in my affright.
To welcome any hope in sight,
So great the terrors of my night.
A steep, straight path before me lay;
Up this I climb and fall each day.

But here one need not go astray,
For there is light along this way;
Through strain of nerve and ache of limb,
My will and conscience follow him.
Sometimes my hand does in his stay.
It is not dark! He leads the way!

CERTAIN MISTAKES OF DEVOTION.

BY MRS. M. E. SANGSTER.

Let me explain that devotion to one's dear ones, not devotion to one's Father in heaven, is the theme of this bit of talk. In the latter case few of us make mistakes, since most of us, unhappily, fail of rendering that perfect sacrifice of self to God in desire, in will and in act which is "our reasonable service." It is the greatest comfort to me, and I am sure it is to you, dear friend for whom I am writing, that "he knoweth our frame. He remembereth that we are dust," and that "like as a father pitieth his children, so the Lord pitieth them that fear him."

But in our very love for our blessed home darlings we are apt to make vital mistakes. Said a sweet young mother the other day, "I allowed Gerald to stay at home from school this morning because he cried when it was time to go, and I thought of those dreadful car tracks he had to cross and fancied some accident might happen if I insisted on his going, and in that case I could never have forgiven myself." As the little fellow was perfectly well and quite able to go to school, and probably only suffering from one of those reactionary moods which come to children as well as to grown people, the mother made a mistake. Another time he would resort to the same argument with greater faith in its potency, and an opportunity for strengthening him in manly resistance to the temptation to inertia was gone forever.

"I did not sleep last night until Claude came home," confessed a sister, who had no special responsibility about the brother who had gone to attend a meeting in a remote part of the town. "Those good government clubs are given to holding assemblages in queer places," she went on, "and I make it a point to keep awake till I hear Claude's latch-key."

"Do you speak to him then and let him know of your vigil?" was asked.

"O no! It would trouble him if he were aware that I was losing my rest. He knows I need my night's sleep. But I am given to worrying over those whom I love."

So are many dear women given to useless and fruitless worrying, which never yet did one particle of good, either to the person who does it or to the person in whose behalf it is done. We may work and we may pray for our beloved, but we may not worry about them if we have common sense and Christian principle to guide us in our daily conduct. The young man is not annealed against evil, nor armed against peril, nor brought home an instant earlier, because his sister tosses on an uneasy pillow on his account. Among the most unfortunate mistakes of devotion to one's family is this chronic habit of worrying, to which some affectionate women are victims.

Another equally to be regretted mistake of devotion is rooted in the love of mothers for daughters, a love, which, in some cases, shields the younger from every care and accepts every burden, till the elder breaks down beneath the strain and the load. One would expect the girls to be more clear-sighted than they sometimes are. One would think that they would see what is plain enough to other eyes, but custom is strong, and when mothers begin with their little ones and never learn when to drop, or how to drop, even an end of the heavy weight of care and work, the daughters grow up accepting self-denials and enjoying ease without a single question till it is too late, and they waken to what they have done when there is no mother to comfort them.

The mistakes of love are legion. Is there not room here for a little self-examination? Is not self-love occasionally dominant, when it seems that altruism is the only motive? May not devotion be weak in its gratification of the impulse to immolation? Ought we not always and consistently to consider the best good of our dear ones? And, when all is said, shall we not for them, as for ourselves, gain the highest rewards by subordinating our whole lives, including all of theirs which blends with ours, to that highest love which lays its all at the foot of the cross. Of only that love may we safely say:

Burn, burn, O love within my heart!
Burn fiercely night and day,
Till all the dross of earthly loves,
Is burned, and burned away.

The blessedness of a true home life for the individual and its power as a regenerating force for society are probably never challenged by our readers. People who take a religious family journal are not among those who hold loose views on subjects of this character. But among some others there is a growing distaste for the wholesome restraints imposed by domestic relations. This dislike is painfully apparent in modern fiction, as pointed out by John Graham Brooks in a recent lecture before a woman's club in New York city. One such author boldly affirms that "if only woman could get over affection she could master the world." The instinctive disgust with motherhood is another false note in this new literature, which Mr. Brooks considers most pernicious in its influence. He calls attention to the vast distance, in point of sound moral teachings on these topics, between Dickens's books, for instance, and those of Hardy or Meredith. We Christian women, who are absorbed in distinctively religious work, probably have no idea how these baneful sentiments are corrupting the young men and women of the present day. But have we no responsibility in the matter?

ONE SOURCE OF OUR DEFECTS IN EDUCATION.

BY KATE UPSON CLARK.

England, far more than any other land, has been recognized as the fountain head of our educational system, but New England shaped and adapted English educational forms to the needs of the new world. Settled by scholarly men to a greater extent than any other section of America, it was only natural that the rest should look to this bleak, infertile region for guidance in school matters. In general this was wise. Thoroughness, accuracy and lofty standards have characterized New England scholarship; but, as immigration has increased and the cities have become crowded with the natives of Western and Southern Europe, the question has arisen, and very properly, Does our old form of education, modeled from England by the New England schools, provide the best curriculum for our public school system?

In considering this subject it should be remembered that an important element in New England training was home culture. The New England home, like the English home, was in itself an education. The boys there were taught to make themselves useful about the house and about the large or small farm which usually went with it. The girl who could not sew a straight, even seam at ten years of age, or knit well, was judged "wanting." She could cook creditably at fifteen or sixteen and understood fairly well the routine of thrifty housekeeping. This was independent of school training. It was well known that the hands of both boys and girls would be carefully trained at home. No account need be taken of those important members at school.

The true New England man and woman became insensibly the model for the entire country. They were, taken all in all, the best specimens of mankind yet produced by our civilization. What was more natural than that educators in the new States should say, "We will study the school systems of New England and shape our own accordingly." They did not realize that they were to provide a system for a population which in large part knew nothing of that home training which contributed so heavily to the general culture of New England. Therefore, they industriously hammered into the youthful craniums of the great middle and western cities the arithmetic, geography and Latin of the old New England curriculum.

These young people grew up. Most of them were obliged to leave school at an early age. Few could study after fifteen. They looked about for something to do, but they found themselves fitted for very few occupations. Most of those which they found they scorned. Then a great wail arose, indistinct at first, but gradually growing more and more emphatic. It was complained that these "educated young people" felt above ordinary drudgery, and yet were unequal to anything else, that, in short, the kind of education which they had received had not been calculated to make them capable and self-sustaining citizens.

A teacher was once visiting the family of one of her pupils, when the mother in a vague way began to find fault with the sort of schooling which her boy was getting. The teacher saw the teapot standing on the stove, and made it the basis of an argument to refute what she felt to be the unreasonable objections of the mother.

"Now there's tea," she remarked. "Just think how nice it is for Tommy to be able to tell all about tea—where it comes from, what kind of people pick it, how it is prepared for the market, and all that!"

"O, mem!" groaned the mother, with a logic far deeper than she knew, "I'd a dale rather he'd know how to airn a pound of it!"

She struck a great truth. It is far more important, much as we may value learning, that a boy should know how to earn his own living than that he should be stuffed with facts, however interesting. In the thrifty and practical New England home such matters were sufficiently attended to. The boy and the girl had each their own manual tasks to do outside of school hours. These tasks taught them the priceless lessons of regular industry. In the homes of our new immigrants and their immediate descendants no such training is given. In the cities there are none of the small chores to do which tamed and tutored the farm boys of New England. Our city gamins range the streets most of the time when they are not in school, learning habits of idleness which will render them totally unfit to take up steady work when school is over.

Hence if our republic is to prosper, the schools must supply the training which the home can no longer be depended upon to give. They must teach the girls something of sewing and cooking along with their arithmetic and grammar. The boys must be drilled in the use of tools and in the practical requirements of business. This must be done because it is impossible, in one generation or in two, to engraft the New England home upon these newer sections. If that could be done, and in every tenement and cabin in our great cities and on our "teeming prairies" the typical New England home could be implanted, with its thrift, its self-respect, its piety, the old methods of education would answer well enough. Indeed, it would almost seem that the millennium had come.

APPLE BLOSSOMS.

Among the young year's breathing hopes,
When eager grasses wrap the earth,
I see on greening orchard slopes
The blossoms trembling into birth.
They open wide their rosy palms
To feel the hesitating rain,
Or beg a longed-for golden alms
From skies that deep in clouds have lain.

They mingle with the bluebird's songs,
And with the warm wind's reverie;
To sward and stream their snow belongs,
To neighboring pines in flocks they flee.
O doubly crowned, with breathing hopes
The branches bending down to earth,
That feel on greening orchard slopes
Their blossoms trembling into birth.

DANIEL WEBSTER.

BY JEANNETTE A. GRANT.

He taught the people of the United States, in the simplicity of common understanding, the principles of the Constitution and government of the country, and he wrought for them, in a style of matchless strength and beauty, the literature of statesmanship.—John D. Long.

New Hampshire treasures the birthplace of Daniel Webster and Massachusetts guards his sacred dust. Within sight of the granite hills he passed his youth as a farmer's son, on his noble estate at Marshfield he found the leisure of his later years and passed away from life within sound of the Atlantic surf beating upon the shore of his adopted State.

Though by natural ties so closely related to New England and so early and truly the expounder of New England's peculiar views, Webster spent himself not for any one section of his country, but for that country as a grand and united whole. During his boyhood the Constitution was adopted, not without much opposition and debate.

WEBSTER AT THE AGE OF 22.*

From the day when the little, dark-eyed lad gave all his money for a cotton handkerchief with the Constitution of the United States printed upon it, Daniel Webster was preparing himself for his mission to his countrymen. Poorly enough were the grand articles of the new Constitution understood by the dwellers in the vast territory it sought to bind together. His father, Ebenezer Webster, a man whom his neighbors delighted to honor, was a firm Federalist. To listen to the arguments of such a patriot was good schooling for the future statesman, who profited well by all his early advantages.

How deeply the spirit of our national government had sunk into the soul of Webster was shown in various orations of his young manhood, but most magnificently on that January day in 1830, when the Senate was thrilled by his memorable Reply to Hayne. Hayne was the South Carolina senator who had made a wholly uncalled-for attack upon New England, Massachusetts and even upon Mr. Webster himself. He had then set forth the doctrine of nullification and the right of any State to reject the Constitution.

The scene in the Senate on the following day has often been described, yet every new reading of the description but makes us regret that such orators as Webster belong to the past and we may never look upon their like. Lovers of New England and Mr. Webster, adherents to the Constitution, sat in silent dejection, fearing that even their great champion might fail them, while Hayne's admirers awaited exultantly the victory they felt sure must follow his eloquence. The greatest agitation filled all hearts, but the man upon whom so much depended was the calmest of them all. Then, with an equanimity which was no less an inspiration than the sweeping tide of argument that followed, Mr. Webster rose and, with a few marvelously chosen words, stilled the tempest that threatened to overthrow the dignity of the occasion. When the secretary had finished reading the resolution which Mr. Webster had called for, every listener realized who was master of the situation and, when that magnificent oration was ended, the Constitution of the United States was vindicated forever.

Yet amid all the applause that was showered upon him the loving heart of the man Webster had one regret: "How I wish my brother Ezekiel had lived till after this speech, that I might know if he would have been gratified," were the words that showed how much more to him was the loving appreciation of his own than anything that fame could bring. Death was always busy in the circle dear to him and the star of the statesman was often obscured by the sorrow of the private citizen.

Ten years before the great speech in the Senate, which made Webster second to no orator of ancient or modern times, he had become the idol of New England through his oration delivered at Plymouth on Forefathers' Day, 1820. His masterly comprehension of the two centuries of Pilgrim history that were past, touched his hearers no less than the brilliant prophecy concerning the future—a prophecy which, though more than realized, at the time seemed hardly possible. On June 17, 1825, the corner stone of Bunker Hill monument was laid in the presence of a grand concourse of people, among them the great Lafayette and forty survivors of the famous battle. Mr. Webster was the orator and well he knew how to use such an opportunity. Edward Everett said of his address, "Happy the ears that heard that heart-stirring strain!"

It was supposed by some people that Mr. Webster did not study his speeches beforehand because he seldom wrote more than the most meager notes or outlines. Yet in the words used to address the veterans present at his Bunker Hill oration is seen a contradiction of this theory, for it is related that while quietly fishing in Marshpee Brook he landed one after another two fine trout. As he placed them in his basket he addressed them as follows: "Venerable men! You have come down to us from a former generation. Heaven has bounteously lengthened out your lives that you might behold this joyous day." At another time while fishing in salt water he caught a large cod, to which he addressed this greeting: "Welcome! All hail! And thrice welcome, citizen of two hemispheres!" The next day showed the words to have been a part of the rehearsal of his speech of welcome to Lafayette.

Although fond of fishing, which with him was more a meditative pastime than a desire for prey, Mr. Webster never wantonly cut short the life of any creature or permitted others to do so upon his premises. The story of his first plea, when at the age of twelve he prevailed upon his father to let the little woodchuck go free from the trap in which he had been caught, ought to be read by every boy and girl.

On Sunday, Oct. 24, 1852, came the end of Daniel Webster's earthly career. He was then almost seventy-one years old. Strangely interesting is the story of these last days at Marshfield, pathetic in many ways and yet triumphant, for the faith that sustained the noble mind in its contemplation of the coming mystery. The flame of life, as he had wished, burned clearly to the end. His last words were proof that his mind was still alert, "I still live!"

Those who knew him best loved Daniel Webster best—his family, his neighbors, his friends. "How lonesome the world seems!" said one of his neighbors as the grave closed over all that was mortal of the great man who had been so kind and true to those about him.

THE LARK'S NEST.

[This lovely prose idyl appeared some years ago in the annual report of a benevolent society written by the wife of the late C. H. Spurgeon of London, and is worthy of a wider circulation.]

I must tell you what happened the other day and how beautifully a sweet singer's confidence was rewarded when fearlessly leaving her earthly treasures in our Father's keeping [Matt. 6: 26] she mounted upward to pay her full debt of daily orisons at heaven's gate. We were making a tour of the garden and pastures, admiring the beauty of the young year's fresh life, noting with tender interest all the charming details of newly awakened responsibility in every living thing, marking the sweet, impatient growth of leaves still rumpled and creased from their recent unfoldings and rejoicing in the whispered promise of golden days to come, which trembled in every scented breath of the perfumed air.

Down in the Dale field we came across a skylark's nest built in the long grass, a lovely little soft-lined cup of coziness, with three pretty brown eggs in it. The sweet songstress had flown up at the approach of human footsteps and thus revealed the secret place of her wee home to inquisitive but kindly eyes. We looked with profound admiration on her happy work and then quietly retraced our steps, having loving sympathy for the poor little fluttering heart which might, perchance, fear the despoiling of its treasures. A day or two afterwards the visit was repeated, but imagine our consternation when, on opening the gate of the field, we saw that the cows had been let into that pasture! How would the great, clumsy, sweet-breathed creatures treat the little home in the grass? Would it not be crushed and trampled by their unheeding feet?

When we reached the spot our surprise and delight were great to find the home intact and the wee birds safely hatched, for though the cows had munched the grass close down to the ground all round the nest not a hoof had touched the little inmates. So there they were, three cunning mites with stubby bodies and big, downy heads, cowering close together in instinctive fear of the human presence which overshadowed them. The cows grazed quietly by and overhead the pretty mother trilled forth her delicious carol in the morning sunshine, pouring out her heart's gratitude and gladness in libations of song. And there, till the little birds were feathered and flown, the cows were every day pastured, yet never a hurt came to the wee nest in the grass.

Who watched over the mother in her peril as she sat and guarded the nestlings in their hourly danger, when the slight protection of her tender body was removed? Who shielded the tiny birds from the tread of the great beasts' feet? Did Daphne know that the nursery on the ground floor must be cared for and respected? Or did Strawberry's mother instinct tell her that little living hearts beat as truly in that wool-lined cup as in the sweet hay crib where her own darling was lying? I cannot tell; the matter is too deep for me, but the lark knew all about it, and it may be that, could our ears have been opened to understand the language of her hymn of praise as she rose higher and higher in the calm blue sky, we might have caught here and there among the joyous notes some such words as these:

Not one,
Not one of them
Is forgotten
In the sight of God.

Not one,
Not one of them
Shall fall to the ground
Without your Father.
Fear ye not, therefore;
Are not ye
Of much more value
Than they?

Did she not do well thus to sing and trust? O, sighing and doubting one, cast away your fears and follow her fair example! You shall not only joyfully leave your earthly cares with your Heavenly Father, but you shall get nearer to God's throne than you have ever been before.

CHURCH-GOING AGAIN.

In your good paper of April 16 the mother who wants church-going made less irksome to her little people appeals to my interest. I have been so often helped by other mothers' ways that I wonder if mine would help her. Our two children are in no way remarkable unless it be for special activity. About their second birthday they seemed to understand enough to be kept fairly still in church as to tongue, but their bodies were allowed some quiet wiggling. Until the habit was established church-going was kept as the reward of good behavior during the week. In church the child was made as comfortable as possible, hat removed and in winter coat. Until the age of four, perhaps, a small, pretty pillow—the church and Sunday pillow—was kept in the pew for the little head upon the mother's knee, and the child was encouraged to lie down after the singing of the first hymn and go to sleep, being roused for the last hymn. Stillness was encouraged out of respect, first, for God's house, and second for the rights of other people who wanted to hear God's word undisturbed. There has never been "a scene," though occasional need of a few strenuous words. Had there been a good grandma in the home to keep the babies they might have been left at home longer, necessitating a later "breaking in." As it is our little people at seven and five expect to go to church and stay through Sunday school, except in case of sickness, as naturally as the grown-ups do. M. O. W.

Closet and Altar

What Christ's prayer was all true prayers must be. You must pray with the great prayer in sight.

It is impossible to rush into God's presence, catch up anything we fancy, and run off with it. To attempt this will end in mere delusion and disappointment. Nature will not unveil her rarest beauty to the chance tourist. Pictures which are the result of a life of work do not disclose their secret loveliness to the saunterer down a gallery. No character can be read at a glance. And God's best cannot be ours apart from patient waiting in his holy presence. The superficial may be put off with a parable, a pretty story, but it is not given to such to know the mysteries of the kingdom of heaven.—F. B. Meyer.

"Not as I will"; the sound grows sweet
Each time my lips the words repeat.
"Not as I will"; the darkness feels
More safe than light when this thought steals
Like whispered voice to calm and bless
All unrest and all loneliness.
"Not as I will," because the One
Who loved us first and best has gone
Before us on the road, and still
For us must all his love fulfill,
"Not as we will."

—H. H.

Some who have been taught from above to desire greatly the manifestations of God, and who wrestle earnestly, perhaps passionately, in prayer that their Lord would be pleased to draw nigh to them and give them visions of his excellence, would find it to their inexpressible advantage to cease from the pursuit of extraordinary manifestations, and by faith and purity of heart school themselves into the ability to discern a present God, and to abide in blissful intercourse with him in whom they live and move and have their being. Let them understand that what they need is not the accomplishment of some charge out of themselves—the bringing near of something that is afar—but a purging of their mental vision, the removal of a film that yet too much beclouds the eye of their soul.—George Bowen.

The Lord does oftentimes lead a soul apart, sets it in the solitude of a sick chamber, or in loneliness of spirit, or takes away from it earthly companions and friends when he would speak with it or heal it.—Trench.

Almighty God, according to our need and pain, our joy and sorrow, our opportunity, our conflict, our triumph, command thy blessing to rest upon us, for without that blessing there can be no beauty, no strength, no duration of gladness. Visit our sick ones. Upon the whole world let thy smile rest; upon all mankind let some token for good abide; make all thy ministers strong in truth, tender in grace and love, rich in human sympathy; stir thy churches as with Pentecostal blessing and inspiration; and upon all efforts made for the dispersion of darkness and the displacement of ignorance let thy blessing come down like a plentiful rain. Pardon our sin; wash us in the fountain which thou hast opened for sin and for uncleanness. Amen.

Mothers in Council.

A KINDERGARTEN FOR MOTHERS.

VI.

Our mother helper gave as her last lecture a summary of all she had tried to bring before us in her previous talks. She placed great stress upon the thought that every man, woman and child in all the world has his place and his work. We see so often in families "fifth wheels," unhappy, not helpful, sometimes selfish. In every case the individual has not been led to make connection with his fellow-beings all along from childhood to manhood. Many young women, living, so far as they know, truly unselfish lives, craving usefulness without knowing how to find it, are suffering from never having been taught that they are creative beings, that they can connect themselves with every one, everywhere, for mutual happiness.

We all love progress and this love in us makes progress. Each parent hopes better for his child than he has done for himself. The need of each child must be an exquisite study. We must see our own children as others see them, and other people's children as their parents see them, in order to accomplish the best results. We should live each truth which our minds have absorbed and re-enforce ourselves in every direction. Many a mother and teacher grows weary in teaching the common, everyday virtues of humility, generosity, loyalty and so on, with no refreshment for herself. We should seek re-enforcements on every side in illustrations of noble living of everyday lives.

A Bright Mother: "What sort of stories should one tell young children, fairy tales or true stories?"

The Mother Helper: "Not too many fairy tales—now and then one. But tell everyday happenings; for instance, describe the domestic life of a hen, her joys and cares, her delight in her children, her anxiety to keep them warm, and so on. We do not make enough of everyday phenomena. Tell the children of the little new baby that is coming in the sky that night, and set them to looking eagerly for the baby moon, and have them watch her growth night after night."

A Mother: "What can one do to help a child to overcome a fear of the dark?"

The Mother Helper: "If it is caused by some fright that the child has suffered, or is hereditary, try to make the dark delightful by being with the child yourself in a darkened room, singing or telling stories and imagining lovely things that are to be seen with the eyes closed. If it is moral cowardice, help the child to grow accustomed to it a little at a time, knowing that you are near, and explain to him the beauty of the darkness, the rest for the eyes, and give him only pleasant things to think of it."

A Grandma: "Sometimes I hear children say on rainy days: 'O, I hate the rain.' What shall I say?"

The Mother Helper: "Tell them the clouds have their work to do as well as the sun. Give many instances of the delight that rain brings, making them glad for others' happiness, rather than urging them to be pleasant in spite of the rain."

A Thoughtful Mother: "Should a child be allowed to pray for things he wants for himself?"

The Mother Helper: "I think children should be taught to use as few words as possible in their prayers and that a tendency to self-love should not be encouraged by asking for personal gifts. If a child is impressed by something that has happened during the day he can be led naturally to express gratitude for that rather than to have his prayer one of petitions only."

A Mother: "I know of a child who prayed all one winter for a kitty and, when none came, expressed reluctance at saying his prayers at all."

The Mother Helper: "And the mother knew of the child's petition all the time?"

The Mother: "Yes."

The Mother Helper: "I think in such a case, where the petition was such an eager one and could be so naturally answered, that the mother was wrong, and that she should say to her child that she was wrong, that God had put it in her heart to give him a kitty and that she had not done it. The case was a serious one."

Another Mother: "But suppose the whole family of children have been praying for a new baby, or something which is impossible to give?"

The Mother Helper: "A child accepts happily the truth that God cannot always give us just what we ask for—he gives what is best."

An Experienced Mother: "Should one compel a small child to go to church?"

The Mother Helper: "O no. Have church with him at home until he wants to go to God's house."

The Mother: "What should he do while the rest of the family are at church—should there be any punishment?"

The Mother Helper: I think he should be allowed to play quietly, to draw and so forth."

A Mother: "Would you encourage a child's sleeping in church?"

The Mother Helper: "I should not encourage it. But after the hymns and the reading of the Bible, if there was an inclination on the part of the child, I should make it comfortable for him and be glad that he was so happy. I have sometimes taken a single picture of the 'mother-play' series to church and have given it to a young child when the restless time was coming on. If the child grows too restless, say, quietly, 'We will go for a little walk,' not making it a consequence, a punishment, but just a sympathetic understanding, and ask him next time to try a little harder. It is too dangerous a thing to make a child dislike church services. They should be privileges to him."

MRS. H. W. BOYNTON.

A FALSE MODESTY.

I believe that married women in general and mothers in particular are unanimous in maintaining that a girl shall be led blindfold through life. She is guarded, shielded, restricted and taught to suppress as unmaidenly the innocent and natural questions which must arise in her mind. Even the text-book upon physiology which is studied is incomplete, misleading and utterly unscientific. If her curiosity is excited by this system of avoidance she may perhaps gain information indirectly, but it is a half-knowledge which is worse than ignorance, and she must still feign innocence before her mother. If tempted, her resistance is due merely to timidity and the strong instinct of maidenhood. If she falls no one ventures to blame those who have kept her ignorant and helpless. On the other hand, if she marries she enters upon her new life with no conception of the duties and responsibilities before her and but scant preparation for them.

Is there not too much false modesty among us? However tenderly girls may be reared, is it not cruel kindness to keep them in ignorance of facts which are regarded as unnatural and improper only because they are treated as mysteries? Certainly a more natural system of education would tend to develop womanliness in girls and would save them from much unrest and many mistakes.

A frank, scientific treatment of the subject is equally essential in the training of boys. Parents should be ashamed to leave their children of either sex to receive from others knowledge which it is their duty and privilege to impart. Rightly given, such knowledge must tend to purity of thought and action and a deep sense of personal responsibility.

M. L. B.

"Mother," said a little girl, "what does trans-Atlantic mean?"

"O, across the Atlantic, of course. Don't bother me."

"Does 'trans' always mean 'across'?"

"I suppose it does. Now if you don't stop bothering me you shall go to bed."

"Then does 'transparent' mean 'a cross parent'?"

Ten minutes later she was resting on her little couch.

No one is useless in this world who lightens the burden of it for any one else.—Charles Dickens.

WILL the Foreman please hang out our Corner sign? There are several letters on hand of an inquisitive sort.

MONT VERNON, N. H.

Dear Mr. Martin: We have seen some birds this winter about as large as robins. The males are a very brilliant cardinal on the body, with a black mark on the head. The females are of a grayish color, with brown on the head. My brother saw twenty-five this morning. Perhaps some of the Cornerers can tell what they are. ALICE S.

Two minutes after I had opened this letter I read it to a gentleman interested in all ...ich matters and he said: "It is the grosbeak ...our pine tree has been full of them for a ...eek." Then I turned the ? over to a Cor...er girl with similar result:

The birds are probably pine grosbeaks. ...hey belong to the same family as the spar...ws and the finches. The birds vary more or ...ss in brightness, and the females have dull ...ddish brown on the head and rump. They ...ave been seen about here all winter, and I ...member seeing them around the evergreen ...ee at home one winter vacation.

The bird is really an Arctic bird when at ...me, but sometimes in severe winters mi...rates South, like other folks. Perhaps ...lice's home on the "Mont" is a cold place ...nd so attracts them! There is an inter...sting discussion in Nuttall's Ornithology ...hether the bird is a resident in Northern ...ew England, or only an immigrant.

Dear Mr. Martin: Will you kindly give the ...tle of one or two more books which will best ...d in studying the birds of Southern New ...ngland? D. F. C.

One is mentioned above. It covers "East...rn North America," is very pleasantly ...ritten and entirely trustworthy. (Little ... FALL RIVER, MASS.

Dear Mr. Martin: I inclose money for the ...orner Scrap-book. Why not start an ex...hange among Cornerers for all kinds of ...abinet specimens, similar to your stamp ex...hange? Nearly all children are deeply in...erested in such collections and their educa...onal influence is very great in gaining a ...nowledge of things and places. My two ...oys, Ernest and Ralph, and myself spent a ...oliday last summer at the abandoned coal ...ines in Portsmouth, R. L.

I think that ? can be answered favorably. ... have had in mind for a long time some plan for arranging exchanges between our members of other things besides stamps. But the cost of printing the leaflets is considerable and new names cannot be added without issuing a new edition, saying nothing of the immense correspondence involved. Instead of such a list, the proposition now is to print occasionally the names and addresses of those who would like to correspond with each other on the matter of obtaining or exchanging collections. If any of you wish to try that method, send your names and full address (omitting street or post office box, unless necessary for delivery), with the particular class of articles you are specially interested in, for instance: Minerals, Fossils, Coins, Woods, Shells, Flowers. Suggestions as to correspondence and exchanges can be made later.

WORCESTER, MASS.

Dear Mr. Martin: I thought that I would write you a short letter in order to answer your question in the Corner Scrap-book [Feb. 10] about the State that was admitted after Tennessee. It was Ohio, my mother's native State, admitted in 1802. The next one admitted was Louisiana, in 1812, during the second war with England. This year I thought that I would make a change from stamps to coins. I go to the High School, belonging to the class of '99, within one year of the "goose-egg class." I have one hundred different coins, foreign and United States. I have also a collection of minerals, antiquities and a little of everything. My brother and I have $350 of Confederate money. ERNEST W.

He is another candidate for the "collections" list. I would suggest to Cornerers not to take too many kinds of things, but rather one or two, and attend to them carefully and thoroughly. Preference should be given also, I think, to ordinary things over things which are simply curious or extraordinary. We need to learn about common, everyday life, not what is odd and unnatural. What does Ernest mean by the "goose-egg class"? 1900? Will that be the first class of the twentieth century?

LEXINGTON, MASS.

Dear Mr. Martin: I send you my picture—how do you like it? I have stopped regulating clocks for a while, though I have now a place where I can buy cast-off clocks by the barrel for a few cents. I pick out the wheels and wires, and make very nice things of them that I think would please you to see. That cathode ray is in my mind now—I can't keep it out. Won't it be wonderful when we can see the inside of things without spending so much time guessing about them? Good-by.

RALPH W.

It does not need any "cathode ray" to show what is in that boy's mind! His collection will be mechanical and scientific. Thanks for the photograph. This reminds me that I have recently received a photograph of another Ralph, one of the earliest of our correspondents. How the Ralphs do accumulate! Here are two—Fall River and Lexington—in this Corner, the one just referred to is three, and a few weeks ago I had a call at the Congregational House from two fine boys of the same name. Soon after I happened to hear of two other Ralphs who were building companion boats for river use this summer. Two days ago while in the cars I noticed a sharp-eyed boy near me looking out of the window, and soon he exclaimed: "There is Ralph in his canoe!" I looked and saw a boy paddling a little boat in a narrow river, which wound around among the bushes. If there are any more ingenious, ingenuous, inquisitive, intelligent Ralphs among our number let them report themselves!

CORNER SCRAP-BOOK.

When Was Dr. Franklin Born? A Vermont reader commends the plan of telling anew the story of patriotic Americans, especially Miss Grant's sketch of Franklin in The Congregationalist of April 23, which began the series. But he wishes to correct the date of his birth as there given in "Old Style," Jan. 6, 1706, saying that it should be Jan. 17, the "New Style" equivalent. This accords with common usage, as, for instance, we celebrate Dec. 21 as Forefathers' Day, although the actual landing in 1620 was on Dec. 11. This brings up the question:

What Are Old Style and New Style? It may be well to preserve the answer in our scrap-books, as the question is often asked, and the exact answer often forgotten. The primitive and natural calendar was by months—that is, moonths—the time from one new moon to another. But as twelve moons did not quite equal one revolution of the earth around the sun, an extra month was occasionally put in to make the lunar and solar years agree. Julius Cæsar, B. C. 45, arranged for twelve months in every year by having some of them contain thirty days, some thirty-one, and February twenty-eight. Add all those days together and you will see that you have 365. As the solar year was really about 365¼ days in length, he decreed that to every fourth year there should be another day added, placing it at the end of February, the shortest month, giving us Feb. 29 in leap, or bissextile, years. But the Julian calendar was not absolutely perfect. That "about" made a fuss, as inaccuracies, however slight, usually do in time. The true year was not quite 365¼ days, but 365 d. 5 h. 48 m. 46 s. After sixteen hundred years had passed away those few seconds became ten days!

The Gregorian Calendar. Pope Gregory XIII. in 1582 devised a wise plan to correct the error, by arranging that the last year of each century should not be a leap year, excepting the year ending every fourth century, i. e., if it can be divided by 400 without remainder it is a leap year, otherwise not. Thus, 1700, 1800 and 1900 are not leap years, but 2000 will be one, as surviving Cornerers at that time will note. The plan was not adopted in Protestant England for nearly two hundred years.

The New Style in England was adopted in 1752, when the discrepancy had amounted to eleven days, and that time was simply dropped from the calendar, Sept. 3 of that year being reckoned as Sept. 14. But it took a long time to drop the old dates, or, rather, to turn them into the corresponding dates of the new calendar, and our Vermont critic thinks we have not quite accomplished it yet! Note that the eleven days were to be added in case of dates of that period, i. e., 1752, but that in adjusting dates of previous centuries a less number is necessary, as the discrepancy had not then become so large. Forgetfulness of that fact caused for many years the curious mistake of celebrating Dec. 22d instead of the 21st for Forefathers' Day. A date in 1492 would need the addition of only nine days.

The New Year. One more important chang was made in 1752. Before that time the civil year had begun March 25 (the day of the "Annunciation" in the Church), but from 1752 on Jan. 1. That explains the frequent occurrence in old records of two dates, as Feb. 22, 1732-3, or, 1732/3. That is only between Jan. 1 and March 25. The true date, to correspond with our calendar, should always be the last figure. A remembrance of this will straighten out many errors which have been made in copying old church or town records.

LESSON FOR MAY 24. Luke 20: 9-19.

JESUS TEACHING IN THE TEMPLE.

BY REV. A. E. DUNNING, D.D.

These final teachings of Christ laid bare before the people the character of their priests and leaders and their own place in the moral life of their nation. Our study of this lesson should show its truths in their setting as he uttered them and then take them out and reset them with present surroundings, so as to bring Christ as Saviour and Judge into personal contact with ourselves. He taught by this parable.

1. God's ownership of his people. The Jewish nation was his planting, not theirs. By their location, laws and customs, divinely directed, he hedged them about and separated them from other nations. He put into the hands of their leaders political power and a yet higher authority over the consciences of the people. He placed in their keeping his most precious promise for the world. He made them know, by their history, their organization, their sacred writings and their daily duties, that they were a peculiar people unto himself.

But our privileges are far greater than theirs, our relations with God far more personal and precious. With a far clearer revelation, a liberty of approach to God which the Jews never knew, an ownership sealed by the sacrifice of his Son, with the presence of the Holy Spirit and the assured hope of the resurrection, no one who studies this parable can be ignorant of God's ownership of him and right to his filial obedience. It must be the conviction of every reader of these words of Christ: "God wants me and has supreme right to me. In his plan he has a use for me and created me for that use. By trustful obedience I can surely accomplish my part in his plan and be an heir of immortal life, a child of God forever."

2. God's patience with his people. They had hardly begun to realize their mission before they began to be discontented with it. When the promised land was spread before them they had not courage to enter it. God sent prophets, one after another, to teach them, but they first refused their instructions, resented their messages with increasing hostility, stoned them and then took to killing them. What a revelation of divine patience is Jewish history: Elijah pursued and threatened, Micaiah scourged and imprisoned, Isaiah sawn asunder, Jeremiah thrown into a dungeon, Zechariah stoned to death, unnamed prophets insulted, tortured, slain. The Jews defied God's claim, usurped his authority, drove out his messengers. Their consciences condemned them. The judgment of history condemns them. No other utterance has so much pathos in it with this dark background as the oft-repeated explanation of the divine forbearance, "Because the Lord loved you." Yet every one who now rejects God's mercy by refusing Christ as his Saviour is worse than the unrepentant Jews, for he has seen a manifestation of the love of God greater than they ever dreamed of. He has chosen his own will instead of obedience to the Son of God, who has died and risen from the dead to deliver him from sin. That men have liberty so to treat God is his highest recognition of man's worth. Not even angels in heaven have ever had opportunity to refuse his proffered grace.

3. The increasing peril of repeated rejection of God's mercy. There was a steady progress in the wickedness of the people in the parable corresponding to the steadily increasing motive urged on them to deal honestly with the owner of the vineyard. The parable was history up to the point where they said, "This is the heir; let us kill him that the inheritance may be ours." The hearers of Jesus knew this. They were then at that point.

But the awful significance of that fact is intensified when we remember that their steps are repeated in many lives of which we know, of men, pressed by the sins of a lifetime, thrusting away in bitterness the helping hand of Christ extended to them and falling into the darkness. It is like human nature to do just this. Any one may finally reject the supreme offer of salvation whose privileges for salvation have been wonderful and constant. We who teach are exposed to such peril. Many whom we teach are in great and increasing danger, actual, awful, of interest overtopping all things, though we but vaguely realize it.

4. The limit of God's patience. It is the limit of his power. God is omnipotent, but, having given himself, he can give no more. Those who reject Christ have rejected the best that God has to offer. "There remaineth no more a sacrifice for sins, but a certain fearful expectation of judgment." The divine purpose from the beginning was declared to be to manifest God through his Son incarnated in human life. In this lesson Jesus emphasized that purpose by repeating the words of an ancient Psalm. He was the corner stone of the kingdom of God on which the completeness of the structure depended. He was and is its everlasting King, foretold, manifested, proclaimed, glorified. The Jewish leaders who resisted him set themselves against the truth without which the nation cannot live. That stone was immovable; by throwing themselves against it they could only break their own power.

Yet that stone was not merely passive, it was active and aggressive. When it assumed the offensive it ground its enemies to dust. The complete obliteration of the Jewish nation and the awful destruction of its capital are the comment of history on this utterance of Christ. In that history is written the doom of the church which casts out Christ and of the soul which rejects him.

Jesus Christ presents himself to every man as the truth, invincible and eternal. Men have hurled themselves against him, declaring that they would destroy him and his teachings, but he is more prominently before men's minds and his authority is more extensively acknowledged today than ever before. Where are the kings, philosophers and statesmen who have attacked him? Their power is broken. If they are remembered it is only to illustrate their failure. But those who have opposed him have not only failed to stop the progress of his kingdom, they have put themselves in the way of its owner's march, so that not to stop it was to be crushed by it. Christ himself utters vengeance on those who persistently resist his appeal. His language implies that he will utterly destroy those who finally reject them.

The alternative, then, is in Christ's own message made personal, the great question for each one to settle, on which his eternal destiny depends—whether or not he will accept Jesus as his Saviour and King. If not he will be deprived of all the trusts which he holds and his life destroyed. If he will he shall enter into larger trusts and clearer understanding of the divine will. The history of the Jewish nation, whose doom Christ foretold, illustrates the one alternative. The growing kingdom of God, into which all nations are being gathered, to whose glorious service God is calling men through the life of his Son, illustrates the other. The choice of wisdom is the service of Christ.

PROGRESS OF THE KINGDOM.

OUR OWN WORK.

ontaneous Movement in the South. Signift evidence of the value of educational sionary work is the awakening desire of colored people in the country districts of th and South Carolina and in Georgia for etter church life. Congregationalism has n slow to take root among the Southern ntations, because the denomination has d for an educated ministry and a self-sup-ing local church, but a change in public iment, due, no doubt, to the influence of graduates of A. M. A. schools, is seen in organization of several new Congregaal churches. In many towns plain, rough dings have been put up with infinite labor self-denial by the humble congregations.
ew such churches are pictured and de-bed in the interesting illustrated article by retary Woodbury in The American Misary for May. He gives an account of the anization under a rude booth of pine ghs of the first mission church in south-Georgia at Hagan. Its pastor, Rev. J. B. tcher, an intelligent Negro, after earnest dy of the New Testament, was won over to lief in a free church polity on Bible prines. The system which he resolved to try substantially Congregational. He called first church Eureka. It now has nine others ociated in the same work, and a Congreional council met in an old, half-ruined olhouse in Hagan for the orderly recogon of these struggling pioneer churches.
Fletcher is receiving calls on every side n the plantation people to establish outions, and his field already includes three nties.

wakening in China. Letters from the Foow Mission of the American Board report idespread religious interest, and tell of ortunities for preaching the gospel in Tiong-loh district such as the oldest sionary has never seen, and this in a l which for years has been accounted most barren and unprofitable in the ole region. About a year ago, however, re were signs of a spiritual awakening.
e chapel in Tiong-loh city became too ll to accommodate the church members, an ancestral hall offered the mission for t was secured. The interest steadily in-ased and spread from the city to the surnding villages. So many requests for istian teachers came pouring in from ghboring communities that the native rch was aroused and sent forth a home sionary band of four lay members to visit se villages and report whether the people re in earnest. It is no exaggeration to say v that thousands are ready to listen atten-ely to the gospel teachings and hundreds re exerted themselves to learn the princis of Christianity. In one village the use large dwelling house, two ancestral halls l one Buddhist temple is offered free; two er villages promise the rent money for pels, and five promise to provide all or t of a pastor's salary. Mr. Goddard, writ-of a trip into the interior to Inghok, says:
here is the same wonderful awakening e as everywhere in the province. It is answer to the multitude of prayers that ended from all Christendom for us at the e of the Ku-Cheng tragedy." The magis-te at Inghok was very friendly and exerted nself to aid in securing land for a mission idence. At a neighboring town, where last r for the first time a school was opened by e of Miss Newton's graduates, the Chris-ns have bought a house for a chapel and ool and have asked that she may remain be their "preacher and teacher." Certainly t was a fruitful year's work for a young l.

THE WORLD AROUND.

oming Christianity in Africa. Frederic Perry ble, in an essay at the Atlanta Congress on rica, a summary of which has recently been published in pamphlet form, views with inspiring hopefulness the outlook for African missions in the twentieth century, which he points out is influenced by four important facts. "Africa by-and-large is in the grip of Christendom. Secular agencies as a whole will work to the advantage of religious forces. European powers protect missionaries and sometimes promote missions. The results of Christian missions in Africa now, at the close of the century beginning 1795, surpass what Carey the Baptist, Coke the Methodist, Johnson the Anglican and Moffat the Congregationalist could have dreamed. The Christian womanhood of the United Kingdom and the United States, the British and Dutch Christians of Cape Colony and Natal and the Negro churches of Africa and the Americas are doubling the force." Mr. Noble lays stress on the value of the Negro as a missionary, and declares that if we would save tropical Africa we must save the Negro of the Antilles, South America and the United States. Already six Negro Baptist and five Negro Methodist bodies engage in missions among African peoples. In answer to the concluding question, What shall Christianize Africa? the author replies: Fellowship between Catholics and Protestants; series upon series of supporting stations along each of the main axes of Africa, and scores of normal schools at strategic centers; the purification of Christendom by Christianity; the conversion and consecration of Christian wealth to missionary service; and, finally, a strong faith in the power of God.

French Evangelistic Work. In common with many larger missionary agencies the McAll Mission has suffered from lack of funds to carry on its regular work. So great was the deficit at the close of its last financial year that it was decided to close the four halls in Lyons and give up the meetings in other towns. The good news comes from Lyons, however, that the Baptist and Presbyterian churches in that city have come to the rescue, pledging themselves to support the four stations. One of the most encouraging features of this mission is the increasing interest of the French Protestant churches in its work. A new hall has been opened by the evangelical church in Grenelle, Paris, which meets all the expenses of the enterprise and several pastors have succeeded in interesting their young people in practical service at the McAll salles. Rev. Jean Mornnier has taken hold of certain departments of the work in the Salle Rivoli, in order to provide an opportunity for activity to a number of students in the Latin Quarter, whom he has gathered about him. French Protestants certainly know how to be generous, but the McAll Mission will be seriously crippled if the gifts from America are curtailed.

PEN AND SCISSORS.

The Church Missionary Society, which in some respects occupies the foremost place among the great missionary organizations, is already calling conferences to consider the celebration of its centenary in 1899. A special forward movement known as the "three years' enterprise" has been proposed, with a view to making the last years of the closing century notable ones in missionary annals.

Alberto J. Diaz, the Baptist missionary who has done such a remarkable work in Cuba, was arrested by Spanish officials for aiding the insurgents, and although he has been released he was ordered to leave Havana immediately. This will be a great blow to the mission and gives rise to many anxious questions regarding its future, but thousands of the Cubans who are fighting for liberty of government are in sympathy also with this movement for liberty of belief.

An organization known as the English Colonial Missionary Society has been formed by British Congregationalists for the purpose of ministering to the churches in the West Indies and in South Africa founded by the L. M. S. in order that the latter society may be able to keep to its direct work of sending missionaries to pagan lands. Dr. Barrett is eloquently presenting the claims of Jamaica in England, while Rev. D. B. Hooke as earnestly pleads the cause of the Transvaal.

The directors of the L. M. S. have had an interview in Paris with the French minister for the colonies in the interests of the Madagascar mission. The French Government was assured of the political neutrality of the agents of the society, while the deputation from England was assured of the neutrality of the French Government in matters of religion. In regard to the educational work of the L. M. S. the attitude of the new rulers cannot be declared until after the special investigation which the resident-general has been charged to make. Already the society has introduced instruction in the French language in its schools.

PRAYER MEETING.

BY REV. ISAAC O. RANKIN.

Topic, May 24–30. Christ's Widening Kingdom. Isaiah 11: 1-10.

As the eye of a traveler who intends to climb a mountain follows its slope all the way from base to summit, so the glance of the prophet follows in one uplifted vision the whole process of the growth of the Kingdom of God. At the beginning is Christ—a rod out of the stem of Jesse and a Branch that shall grow out of his roots, and at the end the earth is full of the knowledge of the Lord, as the waters cover the sea. Between verses 1 and 10 is the whole long climb of the Christian ages which is not yet nearly at an end, and in which our part is patience and endeavor.

The beginning of it all is Christ. Christ who compares his kingdom to a grain of mustard seed, the least of all seeds, but one which grows and spreads until it becomes a mighty tree. It has life in it, and life (if it be the life of God) can never stand still or go backward. It may lose a branch or shed its leaves in winter, but all the time the sap is gathering in its roots for a fresh advance.

We are to have our share in this growth and widening of the kingdom. It must grow first in our hearts until it takes possession there, but while it is growing and because it is growing it must reach out to others. Think of the privilege of being Christ's helpers in the extension of his kingdom. He might do without us, but he chooses to do with us and by our means. To have had a little share in so great a work will be a satisfaction forever. Christ will acknowledge our will to help and use us in ways of which we never dreamed.

If there were to be only one harvest more it would be worth while to sow seed for the single crop it would bring, but when we sow word or deed or money for Christ's kingdom we sow seed that shall produce not one harvest only, but seed for other sowing, and shall increase and multiply through all the years until the kingdom of peace and righteousness is fully come.

As we look at it this widening of the kingdom is a slow process. It calls for patience but not the patience of folded hands and wandering thoughts. It calls for faith, but not the faith that is lost in the fog or is blind to the needs of the church or the opportunities of service. It is patience in endeavor. It is faith that worketh by love. To find the next thing to do for Christ, even though it is a very little thing, is both to serve God and to honor him, and to grow like Christ who came that he might finish the work which his Father had given him to do.

Parallel verses: Ps. 72; Matt. 1: 21; Luke 2: 28–32; John 12: 32; Heb. 1; Ps. 2.

The easiest way to pray for happiness is to say, "Lord, make me useful."

BOOK REVIEWS.

The Age of Hildebrand, by Marvin R. Vincent, D. D. It is natural that the great advances of doctrine toward extreme positions should come on the heels of a reaction against coldness of conviction and looseness of life. It was so in the Roman Catholic Church at the Reformation, which began as a protest against excesses on the moral side but developed into the fixed doctrinal teaching of the Council of Trent. It was so at the earlier stage of which Professor Vincent treats, when a victory for morals carried with it an extreme assertion of church authority never since modified or denied, and forming the basis of the modern distrust of Roman Catholic political claims and activities. It is the spirit of Hildebrand which has called up the American Protective Association and kindred anti-papal organizations. Professor Vincent does well, therefore, to begin with the Emperor Henry's penitence in the snow at Canossa, which marks the historic climax of papal arrogance and lay humiliation.

The story of pope and anti-pope, the outbreak of the iconoclastic movement in the East with the subsequent complete alienation of East and West, the struggle of church and empire, the heresies of Northern Italy and Provence, the battle of the monastic orders and the secular clergy, and the remote and tangled national politics of an unfamiliar age, all pass before us in these pages; but the book would have gained immensely by a vital and unifying grasp of the great tendencies and movements of the time as a whole, and the power of presenting them to us in complete order and subordination. The want of this power at times makes the book rather dry reading. This is, however, the great historian's final gift, and we are not disposed to quarrel with such careful and admirable work as Professor Vincent has given us. Light upon the turning points of the evolution of the church is too precious not to be welcome when it comes in such good modern guise as this. We do not like the cloth imitation of half-calf in which the book is bound, but the make-up is otherwise satisfactory. [Christian Literature Co. $1.50.]

BIBLICAL STUDY.

A Harmony of the Life of St. Paul, by Rev. Frank J. Goodwin. The substance of many more expensive volumes is compressed into this little book of 240 pages by a studious Congregational pastor. It is a wonder that no one has attempted the task before, but so well has it been accomplished that it will be no wonder if it is not attempted again for a long while to come. To be sure many details are in dispute, but this is frankly acknowledged and authorities on opposite sides are cited. The plan includes a presentation in parallel columns of the pertinent matter from the Acts and the various epistles. Often as many as four columns are thus compared. There follows a running explanation in footnotes (chiefly cited from leading scholars) which forms a handy commentary on the entire life of the apostle. Difficulties are faced, not dodged, and various important matters are treated in an appendix of seventeen sections; for example, Paul's Visions, Paul's Second Visit to Corinth, The Origin of the Church at Rome, The Sufferings of Paul. It is emphatically a workable book for both ministers and laymen, and although to be classed with reference books it may well be read through consecutively. There are maps of the journeys, and the indexes are reasonably full. [American Tract Society. $1.75.]

The Life to Come, by Rev. William P. Lewis, D. D., belongs to a class of books which are very hard reading, because they are not thought out in an orderly way and are confusedly written. If we grasp Dr. Lewis's thought of eschatology, he believes, or is nearly sure that he believes, in conditional immortality, in purgatory (not the Roman Catholic sort, however), and in prayers for the dead, and he draws from Peter's words about Christ's preaching to the spirits in prison many conclusions as to remedial processes in the intermediate state. He is very much in earnest and there are suggestive passages here and there growing out of long thought and genuine personal experience, but the confusion of thought and method seems to us so great that we cannot recommend students of eschatology to devote much time to the book. [George W. Jacobs & Co. 75 cents net.]

In Creation Centred in Christ, Dr. H. Gratton Guinness continues his studies in prophetic chronology. The subject is so mysterious that despite the utmost efforts of many scholars it still remains in nearly total darkness. There seems to be no hope of solution and the appearance of such a book as this causes regret that so much learning and energy is put forth with such small results. [A. C. Armstrong & Son. $2.50.]

The Wonderful Law, by H. L. Hastings, is a defense and exaltation of the Mosaic law. The traditional view of its origin is maintained throughout the book. Certain occurrences in the early history of the Hebrews which are repugnant to our ideas today, though not inexcusable among such a people and at that time, are explained away by assumptions which do equal violence to the Bible and to common sense. We refer especially to the explanation of the destruction of the Midianites as recorded in the book of Numbers [p. 54 ff]. Two quotations will show to what class this book belongs. On page 36 we are told that "in some cases burning was inflicted, but this was not said to be burning alive, but was probably the burning of persons previously put to death." On page 51 we read, "The people of Canaan well knew that God had given that land to the Israelites [Josh. 2: 9–11]. Their true course was to submit or to emigrate." The time has gone by for the consideration of such statements. The author gives an interesting comparison of the Mosaic law with our more modern codes and it is here that what little value the book has will be found. [H. L. Hastings. $1.00.]

POETRY.

The Pilgrim and Other Poems, by Sophie Jewett (Ellen Burroughs.) At its hight this is a book of the rarest and most exquisite quality, and all the more notable for being strongest where it is most serious. The title poem has a haunting music of thought and expression, and the sonnets are worthy of their high theme of friendship. [Macmillan & Co. $1.25.]

He who loves to wander in the byways of literature and feels himself at ease in the company of books may spend an agreeable evening with Book Verse, which is an anthology of poems of books and bookmen from the earliest times to recent years, edited by W. Roberts. An introductory essay carries us back into the studies and book stalls of ancient Rome, and the praise of books by their authors, copyists, printers and admirers follows pleasantly down the centuries. [A. C. Armstrong. $1.25.]

The Road to Castalay by Alice Brown shows a wide range of interests and a delicate sense of poetical form. The verses are musical and suggestive, and their feeling for the life of the world and the spirit will bring pleasure to readers. There is much promise in the book. [Copeland & Day $1.00.]

Of Undertones, by Madison Cawein, the best word which we can say is that they belong to the wholesome out-of-door world which he evidently loves and has studied with care. They are more or less immature, the word combinations often seeming to be chosen by sound rather than sense, so that they are sometimes laughable and sometimes unintelligible. Does he really think that "the loafing sunlight's lazy laugh" is a poetical achievement? And must he sacrifice the music of a delightful song by rhyming farm and storm? And what are "ruin-wedded woods" and "momentary skies?" If the author would keep a little further from the outward bounds of poetic license he would often move us with the delicate thought and fancy which pervades his verse. [Copeland & Day. 75 cents.]

In the beautifully printed and convenient edition of the Temple Shakespeare we have Coriolanus, Troilus and Cressida, Romeo and Juliet and Titus Andronicus. The critical matter is compressed into a well written historical preface and brief notes, and the addition of a glossary makes each play complete in itself. [Macmillan & Co. Each 45 cents.]

STORIES.

Cleg Kelly, Arab of the City, by S. R. Crockett, shows the marvelous versatility of the author. With equal power he pictures the simplicity of country life and the varied wickedness of the great city. Humor, pathos, sarcasm and sympathy follow each other in rapid succession, while there are few characters that could appeal more deeply to us than that of "Muckle Alick," in its simplicity and strength. As for Cleg himself, from his introduction in the words "It's all a dumb lie—God's dead," to his farewell speech, when, as a rich man, he has founded a club for his old friends of the "Sooth Back," he is a fascinating character. Agile as a monkey, good natured, quick-witted, chivalrous, ready for every emergency, he makes us feel that life in the slums has its bright side after all. One of the most amusing passages is that describing the methods of love-making in the "Sooth Back." Towards the close of the book there is a combination of horrors which seems unnecessary, and, indeed, the book shows some evidences of hasty writing. [D. Appleton & Co. $1 50.]

The jewel of thought in Mrs. H. P. Spofford's latest book, A Master Spirit, is somewhat overshadowed by the opulence of language in which it is set, but the little story seems to teach that suffering is essential to the highest art. The particular form of art in this case is music, and the lesson is skillfully wrought out in the experiences of three characters—a singer who has lost her voice and is embittered thereby, the heroine, Domina, and her easy-going lover, Gratian. [Charles Scribner's Sons. 75 cents.]

A noble-hearted English girl of humble station in life, whose father is a veritable

Shylock, two rival lovers, one of whom is falsely charged with the murder of the girl's father, and finally the opportune deliverance of the accused are the principal features of the story of Judith, by Evelyn E. Green. Different types of English social life afford a setting for these main facts, which are told with much moral earnestness. [A. I. Bradley & Co. $1.00.]

One long story of eight chapters, called My Wonderful Wife, a study of child life entitled Tiny Tramps, as full of frowning pity as Mrs. Browning's Cry of the Children, and eight short stories comprise the volume of Cameos by Marie Corelli. The same characteristics of pathos, sensibility and power which mark her novels appear in this group of shorter writings, which easily enchain the attention but are almost too intense to be wholesome. [J. B. Lippincott Co. $1.00.]

In Harper's handsome illustrated series of reprints of the novels of Thomas Hardy, of which some numbers have already been noticed, we have The Hand of Ethelberta, A Laodicean and Desperate Remedies. [Harper & Brothers. Each $1.50.]

TEXT-BOOKS.

Inductive Logic is an excellent elementary text-book by President Ballantine of Oberlin. It is compact and condensed yet seems to cover all necessary ground. In many places the author takes great pains to give negative information. Extracts from other authors are frequent and judicious. The book commends itself especially by its simple style and freedom from involved and equivocal sentences. [Ginn & Co. 90 cents.]

Inductive Logic by Professor Hibben of Princeton may be advantageously used as a supplement to President Ballantine's book. It treats of the higher departments of the science. Numerous examples and quotations are a prominent feature. The elements of logic are apt to be rather dry, and it is only when one goes farther and studies their application to everyday but important matters that he learns how interesting a study it may become. It is for this class of students that this book is intended and to them it will be very useful. [Charles Scribner's Sons. $1 50.]

Elements of Botany by J. Y. Bergen, instructor in biology, English High School, Boston. This is strictly a text-book for high school work, in which the emphasis is laid on morphology and vegetable physiology rather than on the exploration, analysis and classification of the older method. In this handling the science becomes more a matter for the laboratory and the microscope is its instrument. The book is founded on long classroom experience and seems clear and practical. [Ginn & Co. $1.20 ]

Laboratory Work in Chemistry, by Edward H. Keiser, professor in Bryn Mawr College. This is a well-made book for the use of students who desire to do work supplementary to that of the classroom. [American Book Co. 50 cents.]

Want of space will only allow us to mention the following mathematical text-books. From the American Book Company we have a new and improved edition of Robinson's Higher Arithmetic. This is a book tested in thirty years' use, and changed only for its better adaptation to the business uses of the time [$1.00]. The Elements of Algebra, by Lyman Hall, professor in the Georgia School of Technology [$1.00]. Elements of Plane Geometry, by John Macnie, edited by Emerson E. White [75 cents]. Concrete Geometry for Beginners, by A. R. Hornbrook [75 cents].

English text-books are: Elementary English, by Robert C. Metcalf, supervisor of schools, Boston, and Orville T. Bright, superintendent of schools, Cook County, Ill. This is a well-illustrated and diversified book for language training, and is a model of its kind in supplying interesting material for the teacher's work and adding a complete index. [American Book Co. 40 cents.] Fairy Tale and Fable, an Introduction to Literature and Art, by John G. Thompson and Thomas E. Thompson, which is designed to follow the primer and introduce the pupil to famous stories in the simplest dress. The pictures are well-known popular favorites well reproduced, but can hardly be said to fulfill the claim of being "the best works of the world's great artists." [New Century Educational Co. 33 cents.] An English Grammar, for High School, Academy and College Classes, by W. M. Baskervill and J. W. Sewell. This book is an attempt at a simplification of its topic, and follows the good plan of keeping close to literature throughout. [American Book Co. 90 cents.]

MISCELLANEOUS.

In The House, An Episode in the Lives of Reuben Baker, Astronomer, and of His Wife Alice, we have a posthumous and unfinished book by Eugene Field. Only one chapter is missing, however, and the book contains the familiar traits of humor and insight which made Mr. Field so much beloved. It narrates the ambitions, anticipations and realizations of a family who desired and finally obtained and improved a home of their own—a congenial and suggestive theme. [Charles Scribner's Sons. $1.25.]

The Evolution of Church Music, by Rev. F. Landon Humphreys, Mus. Doc., is a beautifully made book with an introduction by Bishop Potter of New York. It is partly historical and partly critical, and the historical part is an interesting account of the matter under consideration which we have read with pleasure. We agree, too, with many of the critical conclusions of the book. The author's statement that "Antioch is one of these fugal hymns still retained in some modern collections, perhaps as a curiosity, for the writer does not remember having heard any choir sing it for many years," bears witness to the narrow range of his observations. The list he gives of the purely secular or profane origin of popular hymn tunes might be greatly extended, but they are not all to be condemned on that account, nor can we think that Bethany is a "trifling air." The last word has not been spoken upon the limits of good taste and devotional feeling in church music, but we believe they will include much more than our author is inclined to allow. So good a book should not have been sent out maimed of half its usefulness for lack of an index. [Charles Scribner's Sons. $1.25.]

The Agnostic Gospel, a review of Huxley on the Bible, with related essays, by Prof. Henry Webster Parker. We like the later and independent essays of this book better than the polemic part and find them often exceedingly suggestive. Those who care for vigorous fighting will find it here, however, and Professor Huxley's wanderings out of his own field are pointed out with considerable dialectic skill. [John W. Alden. 75 cents.]

Rev. A. B. Cristy, pastor of the Lakeview Congregational Church of Cleveland, sends us his Historical Sketches of Our Twenty-five Churches and Missions, which is an illustrated directory and local history of Cleveland Congregationalism. It gives a good idea of the strong and aggressive forces which are working together in the lake city, both by its statistics and by the portraits with which the pages are filled. The profits of the publication go to aid the Lakeview Church. [Rev. A. B. Cristy, Cleveland, O. 75 cents.]

Calvary Baptist Church of New York recently celebrated the twenty-fifth anniversary of the pastorate of Rev. Robert S. MacArthur, D. D., and sends us the published account in Silver Anniversary, a loving tribute to a beloved pastor. It is beautifully printed and illustrated, having as frontispiece a fine photogravure of Dr. MacArthur, and is appropriately bound in white and silver. [G. P. Putnam's Sons.]

NOTES.

—— Mr. Rudyard Kipling has written a novel, the scene of which is laid in Gloucester, Mass.

—— Boston University is to give a representation of The Captives by Plautus on May 16, and succeeding dates.

—— Miss Mary E. Wilkins is suffering from the effects of overwork and has gone South for rest and recuperation.

—— A recent endowment, says The Dial, has made it possible for Columbia University to take the important step of establishing a school of music.

—— It is said that Mr. Crockett has already mortgaged himself to the publishers by contracts which will require his whole time until 1902 for their fulfillment.

—— In connection with the 250th anniversary of the founding of New London, Ct., an article by Henry Robinson Palmer in the New England Magazine for May is of interest.

—— In the death of Professor von Treitschke Berlin University loses one of its most famous and popular teachers and the anti-Semitic party in Germany its most scholarly leader.

—— With the May number the Cambridge Magazine enlarges its form and adopts a new cover. It is by all odds the most valuable and interesting of the five-cent magazines, both for its unity of aim and the quality of its literary contents.

—— Among the pictures exhibited at the Paris Salon this year are the panels for the great staircase of the Boston Public Library by Puvis de Chavannes. They have excited much interest and been highly praised by the critical authorities.

—— Mr. George Munro, the publisher, whose death occurred recently, was the father of the modern cheap libraries. He was a native of Nova Scotia, where he had been a teacher before coming to New York, and he remembered Dalhousie College at Halifax with gifts, during his lifetime, of $500,000.

—— Prof. A. G. Emerick has presented to one of the Philadelphia libraries his large and important collection of books and manuscripts upon the subject of music. With the collection already made this becomes one of the three most important musical libraries in the country, the others being in New York and Boston.

—— The many who have desired to know just what was said and done at the Madison (Ct.) council, which found Rev. William T. Brown not guilty of heresy, can by sending twenty-five cents to Wilson B. Coe, Madison, procure a pamphlet entitled The Christian Liberty of Ministry and Laity in the Congregational Churches.

GLEANINGS FROM OUR MAIL BAG.

EXCHANGES BETWEEN THE WEST AND EAST.

Home missionaries on the frontier frequently receive missionary boxes of good things and sympathy from Eastern churches, all of which are highly appreciated. But if the pastors of some of our larger churches could come in person to our missionary fields at intervals and give us the benefit of their presence, help and encouragement for a brief season they would confer even a greater boon upon us. Many a hard-worked missionary never has any vacation. He cannot attend summer schools, Chautauqua assemblies, or make a pilgrimage to England and Holland with The Congregationalist's party. It has been suggested by The Congregationalist that pastors of the larger churches make occasional exchanges with missionary pastors. A missionary on the frontier has wondered whether this suggestion has ever been acted on and whether he would be out of place in offering such an exchange, by which he might see a New England church and Boston, neither of which it has ever been his fortune to visit. Here is a home missionary church on the frontier, the mining camps are all around us, the air, scenery and warm baths unexcelled. In fact, here is a health resort to which people come from all parts of the country and get recreated among the pines and eternal hills—an ideal spot to spend a brief vacation and nowhere can you see and find more genuine home missionary work.

Wanted, by the missionary on this field, any time from May to October, to exchange churches for six or eight weeks with an Eastern pastor. Address Congregationalist'. R.

"ESSAYS SCENTED WITH RELIGION."

When the value of some sermons we hear are questioned we are told we are not up in modern theology, advanced thought, etc. We sometimes wonder that these modern thinkers should condescend to take a text from such an old-fashioned book as the Bible must be to their minds. The sermons referred to have been called Essays Scented With Religion. They do not believe it wise to preach fear as an element to move men when the Bible is full of instances from Noah to Christ and his apostles. No one used stronger language as to whom we were to fear than Christ. They seldom make any reference to heaven or hell, God's love and mercy is their theme, but little is said about the justice of God; good works, good citizenship is preached, which none are found to condemn. The love and mercy of God is made so prominent it tends to relieve men from any great anxiety about the future; God is so good he will not punish them, or they are so good he will certainly save them.

How would the old-fashioned preachers like Finney, Payson, Whitfield, Parsons, Wallace and a score of others compare with some modern preachers? Yet, strange to say, God did bless their labors abundantly. How can our "modern thought" preachers explain it. Where now we have empty seats in our Sunday service they often were obliged to speak in the open air such crowds followed them. We are sometimes asked the question, in view of the change which has come in the doctrines preached as compared with that preached fifty years ago, what will be the style of presenting truth fifty years hence? Has not the pendulum swung too far from the great central truth? Boundless as is the love and mercy of God it never has nor ever will abrogate the penalty of sin unrepented of. Men make their condition here by their sins. They sin and suffer.

Is there any reason to believe it will be different in the next world? Holiness makes heaven, sin makes hell, wherever they predominate. Men may say in death they are freed from the temptation to sin by the absence of the body, but sin originates in the mind, not the body, the latter is only the instrument used. H.

SUGGESTIONS FOR "ANXIOUS OBSERVER."

The writer from force of circumstances attends a Presbyterian church, and has not heard a simple, helpful, gospel sermon from the pastor in three months, if in six. Only a few Sundays ago over an hour was spent in explaining Presbyterianism to a weary audience while hungry souls were there for soul food. An evening discourse on Why Am I Here? was on the pastor and his position. Still another morning was devoted to The Solidarity of Humanity, delivered in such high-sounding words that one young man, not a Christian, who was present from a sense of duty, has given up going to church since because such a theme was too far above him, and he an intelligent man too. He needed to have Christ held before him, something he could understand and accept.

This pastor is trying to do to the best of his ability, but seems to have lost sight of the soul-saving message he was commissioned to preach. Shall I add that this pastor wonders why his congregations are growing steadily smaller and religious life seems stagnant, while the finances, too, are in a precarious condition. There is money enough right here, but the people who should fill the pews remain at home because they get neither help nor instruction from such sermons.

Is this an isolated case? No; the same cry is heard all about us, and what is to be the result? Men and women want to hear the gospel, else why do they go to church, and it is true that any man who preaches the simple, true gospel does not want for hearers nor for the means to live as God wants him to live. HUNGRY HEARER.

SUNDAY BICYCLING.

Your article Bicycles versus Sunday interested me deeply and helped me much. I am not a bicycle rider, but a middle-aged, Puritan, Yankee woman. Often, recently, I have heard those of my own age and older speak bitterly, unkindly, in a very un-Christian spirit, of the bicycle riders spoiling our Sunday—of bicycles being the great enemy of the Sabbath. Every time, in my heart, I find myself defending the bicycle rider. I have taken pains to be observant and see in what way they spoiled our Sabbath. They pass my door on Sunday morning, singly or in company, silently, swiftly out into God's beautiful open—the air, the woods, the birds, the flowers—and in sincerity I say, God bless them! By how many voices he will speak to them today and draw near to their hearts and their lives. . . . I am many times pained when I look about on Sunday and see our churches only open on the Sabbath for well-to-do people to go well dressed and over dressed to church, but all the week days standing closed and cold. I cannot blame the intelligent toilers for going in a quick and quiet way far afield to "God's first temples." When my sons ask me if I think it wrong for them to ride their bicycles on Sunday, I say "Yes, my boy, you can ride all the days of the week." Neither do I miss from their pews in church the sons of our neighbors and friends. It seems to me like all the many good and new things which have come during the century. With the good and the blessing there is also evil and abuse. Do not let us be so rigidly orthodox that we forget to be Christlike. S. H. W.

There are some who desire to know with the sole purpose that they may know, and it is curiosity; and some who desire to know that they may be known, and it is base ambition; and some who desire to know that they may sell their knowledge for wealth and honor, and it is base avarice; but there are some, also, who desire to know that they may be edified, and it is prudence; and some who desire to know that they may help others, and it is charity.—*S. ## DR. WALKER ON PHASES OF NEW ENGLAND RELIGIOUS LIFE.

BY E. W. C.

The Carew lectureship at Hartford Theological Seminary is this year filled by Rev. George Leon Walker, D. D., who has taken for his theme Some Phases of the Religious Life of New England with Special Reference to Congregationalists.

Dr. Walker stated that his purpose was to describe the religious life in its experimental and interior aspects, and then he passed to the consideration of the Puritan period (1620–1700). The settlers brought with them a conception of religion as a personal matter and a belief in extreme Calvinism. The first characteristic of their religious life was their profound sense of the divine sovereignty. Even morality rested solely upon the will of God. His irresistible authority they believed was acting in their behalf. Another element was their belief in man's absolute helplessness in moral matters. The passivity of the soul in conversion was considered a fundamental truth. The settlers also believed in the authority and universality of application of the Scriptures. The New Haven congregation came and remained uncovered while the text was read, because they then heard the Spirit of God speaking. The life in those days, however, was not essentially hard and gloomy. In their legislation and their treatment of witches they showed more mercy than the other country did. They had a keen appreciation of natural beauty and their home life was full of love and joy.

In his second lecture at Hartford Seminary Dr. Walker sketched the period of decline, 1700–1735. The signs of this had so clearly appeared by 1679 that the Reforming Synod of Massachusetts in that year bore testimony to a "great and visible decay of the power of godliness in the churches." This declension was inevitable among a people born in a new and undeveloped country. Life in its dignities and ornaments stood at a lower level than before. The period was marked by political anxiety, contentions with the English governors, Indian wars, the witchcraft delusion, and the persecution of Quakers and Baptists—all of which tended in the same direction. A still greater cause of the decay in religious life grew out of the attempt to save the cause of piety by adopting the Half-Way Covenant, which cheapened the conception of the value and responsibility of church membership. Church life began to be characterized by formalism and indifference. Intemperance, lying, profanity and licentiousness became very common.

This period was followed by the Great Awakening. This movement, together with some of its sequels, formed the subject of the third lecture, which covered the years 1735–1790. The two prominent leaders were Jonathan Edwards, in whose church in Northampton the revival began in the autumn of 1734, and George Whitefield, who made several evangelistic tours of New England. During the first, in 1740, he aroused the people as no other man has ever done. But his censorious condemnation of his brother ministers, and the importance he attached to religious excitement, prepared the way for the reaction which followed. The interest subsided almost as suddenly as it had arisen. Yet it left a permanent impression on the church. The character of the preaching became more earnest and intense. There was, too, a reversion to a modification of the earlier type of theological thought. This was attended by the ephemeral but interesting Separatist movement. The dogmatic discussion developed the so-called New England theology, and planted the seed from which was to spring the Unitarian movement. While the close of the period was marked by comparative coldness and torpidity, yet the churches had been increased and purified and disciplined in the close handling of religious truth.

At the beginning of the period 1790–1858 there were three lines along which theology was developing. There was the liberalizing movement, which placed less emphasis upon the merit of Christ's death and more upon character. A more numerous school was that of the Old Calvinists. While they held to the old views of the soul's passivity in conversion, yet they urged the use of means of grace as a preparation for salvation. In the south and west of New England were the influential new divinity men, the descendants, theologically, of Edwards. They were ultra-Calvinists and held that the essence of sin is selfishness, and that the use of means of grace by the unregenerate is selfish and sinful.

About 1797 there swept over New England a profound revival, which was in marked contrast to the Great Awakening, as it was severely intellectual in character. In this the new divinity men were the leaders. It was characterized by a profound sense of sin, a belief in God's disregard of all unregenerate doings and in the duty of absolute submission to God, even to a willingness to be eternally lost. With some modifications in method and doctrine, the movement continued nearly half a century and its importance cannot be overestimated. The results were far-reaching. The missionary movements among the Congregationalists and Baptists had their roots in this revival, and to it may be traced, directly or indirectly, the founding of three of our theological seminaries. The Half-way Covenant vanished and Christians came to oppose intemperance, the theater, dancing, etc. Side by side with this revival, the liberal school first mentioned developed until it led to the withdrawal of eighty-five churches, which joined the Unitarian movement.

In his last lecture Dr. Walker set forth, without pronouncing judgment upon them, some of the characteristics of the modern period, covering the years since our great divisional war.

The first characteristic of this period has been an immense development of voluntary organizations for moral and religious objects. Through them the channel for benevolent activity is unprecedented. There has developed alongside of this a tendency to outwardism of character. The past said: "Consider, be, become." The present substitutes for these: "Resolve, seek, do." Closely connected with this latter phase is the changed conception of the experience properly qualificative for reception into the Christian Church. Many are now received into full communion who have had a less marked experience than was required of those who came into partial fellowship under the Half-way Covenant. A fourth characteristic is an abated sense of the danger of men apart from personal experience of the gospel power. Then, too, the attention given to systematic religious doctrine has declined. Doctrinal preaching has largely ceased. Of still larger significance is the changed conception respecting the church. Formerly it was considered a home for souls rescued from a lost world, while now it is coming to be regarded as an instrumentality for the redemption of society. Respecting the nature and authority of the Scriptures, the attitude of the scholarly and general mind has decidedly changed. The Bible has been put upon a lower plane from that which it once occupied. On the other hand, there has been an increasing sense of what is obligatory in Christian activity, so that very few Christians deem it becoming for them not to be identified with at least one of its different agencies. The responsibility of wealth and position is being realized more than before.

Whether or not we believe these tendencies to be helpful, we may be sure that they are not a finality and that they will aid in bringing in the one event to which all the world moves, the kingdom of the Lord and of his Christ.

Daily prayer meeting, 11 A.M., Bible study, 3 P.M. Sunday services, usual hours. Meetings every evening except Saturday. Branch mission, Vineyard Haven. Is a Congregational society and appeals to all Congregational churches for support. Send donations of money to B. S. Snow, Corresponding Secretary, Room 22, Congregational House, Boston. Send clothing, comfort bags, reading, etc., to Capt. S. S. Nickerson, chaplain, 287 Hanover St. Bequests should read: "I give and bequeath to the Boston Seaman's Friend Society the sum of $——, to be applied to the charitable uses and purposes of said society." Rev. Alexander McKenzie, D. D., President; George Gould, Treasurer.

PASSING COMMENT.

It means something to hold the longest pastorate in Colorado, even though Congregationalism in the State is only a little over three decades old.

A reception given to new members is the custom in a number of churches. It is not yet too late for such a welcome to be given to the most recent accessions in other churches.

In the reports of conversions so numerous in our columns at this season we rejoice that not a few elderly persons have not allowed regret for past remissness to be an obstacle in the way of fulfilling their present duty.

The many accessions at the May communion resulted in part from the special care and training which the pastors exercised in properly fitting their young people. There is greater need than ever of such instruction classes as we report this week from a number of places, owing to the age of hurry in which we live and the consequent danger of lack of thoroughness. The strength of our ranks is dependent upon the individual fitness of new recruits.

THE NEW CHURCH HOME OF A HILLSIDE TOWN.

The summer visitors to that popular resort, Mt. Vernon, N. H., and especially those who have generously aided the enterprise to completion, will rejoice with the church at the near prospect of dedicating a new edifice. The church, being the only one in town, has attracted the interest of many former residents who, as occupants of their summer home, will be directly benefited by the improvement. The building stands on the hilltop, across the street from the old site, the parsonage having been removed a little to allow of the change. As the cut shows, a substantial square tower rises above the main entrance and porte-cochère on the corner and at the top supports a belfrey and lookout. The building itself, of the colonial design, is of pleasing appearance and is constructed of field stone around the base and of wood above. Its interior is cruciform, having the organ and choir gallery on the east and the pastor's room on the west side. The audience-room is fifty-three by thirty-six feet in size and seats 300 persons. The light finish of the woodwork and tinted walls reflecting the radiance from the ample windows produce a charming effect, some of the windows admitting clear light and seven others being memorials of stained glass. The pulpit is the gift of the present pastor, Rev. T. J. Lewis.

At the south end of the main floor are the Sunday school and prayer rooms and the parlor, all of which, opened into the auditory, enlarge the seating capacity by 200 An ample supper-room, with kitchen conveniences, and a library section are added features in the arrangements.

The success of the undertaking is due to the consecrated efforts of the church members and the generous gifts of individuals. Mrs. Richardson and Miss Stevens, the daughters of the late Calvin Stevens, have added $5,000 to the subscriptions. The total receipts aggregate about $11,000. Other expenses are yet to be provided for, but it is hoped to dedicate the edifice in June free from debt. Dr. Nehemiah Boynton has consented to preach the dedicatory sermon. The membership of the church is about 120.

THE OKLAHOMA ASSOCIATION.

At this latest association meeting in Kingfisher, April 30–May 3, 125 delegates were present. Judge A. B. Hammer was moderator and Rev. R. B. Foster, the veteran registrar, reported for the churches, which together showed substantial growth.

Dr. R. B. Foster preached the sermon, a helpful and intellectual discourse. On the subject of general discussion, The Organization of Churches in Oklahoma, Rev. C. N. Queen read a paper on What Shall We Require of Ministers Who Come to Us from Other Denominations? He insisted chiefly upon a high standard of ministerial character. In the Sunday school hour the territorial superintendent, Rev. J. E. Platt, reported 91 schools organized, and a gain of 900 on the roll for the past year. Rev. R H. Harper and Dr. G. M. Boynton filled out the hour with good speeches.

The woman's hour, in charge of Mrs. J. H. Parker, was well spent, and the home missionary hour, in charge of Supt. J. H. Parker, was occupied by addresses on How to Raise Money? How to Evangelize the Masses? The Home Missionary as a Pastor, The Relation of the C. H. M. S. to the C. C. B. S. Superintendent Parker's report showed 90 churches organized, 57 buildings erected, and 45 home missionaries on the field.

One afternoon the association spent at College Hill, witnessing the laying of the corner stone of Kingfisher College, now in process of erection, under direction of this body. Eloquent and inspiring speeches were made by several representative citizens of Oklahoma and by our visitors from New Engand—Dr. G. M. Boynton and Rev. Messrs. G. A. Hood and B. M. Wright. The college promises to be a grand institution and a great blessing to Oklahoma.

Sunday was the last great day of the feast. The services began with a sunrise prayer meeting and a communion service, and a home missionary experience meeting later. At the following session Dr. Boynton preached grandly. A mass meeting of C. E. workers was held in the afternoon and a gospel meeting in the evening, addressed by Rev. Messrs. C. N. Queen, G. A. Hood and B. M. Wright. The services were all harmonious, interesting and profitable. Practical questions were considered and important plans adopted.

THE NEW PASTOR AT OMAHA.

Rev. Frank A. Warfield was born Oct. 4, 1846, studied at Yale, graduated at the Theological Institute of Connecticut in 1870, preached at Staffordville, Ct., and Globe Village, Mass , and in 1873 was installed pastor at Greenfield. In 1876 he became pastor of the Union Church, Boston, where he remained until 1881. In 1882 he began his labors in the Brockton Church, from whence he has just gone to the First Church, Omaha, where he preached his first sermon May 3.

Mr. Warfield has made a fine record at Brockton as a remarkable organizer, a superior preacher and a tireless opponent of intemperance and other foes of civic health. He goes to a strong church in a great Western city, which has been pastorless since May 1, 1895, and yet has kept its pulpit well supplied and paid off $10,000 of its debt, despite the hard nes. Mr. Warfield's acceptance of the call as inspired the church with new courage and ere is now no reason why, with a fine church roperty in excellent condition and of great alue, with a Ladies' Society whose record r effective and harmonious effort has rarely een equaled, and an earnest and faithful mplement of men whom a zealous and wellalanced leader can quickly stimulate and ad, the church should not speedily win back s place among the great Congregational urches of the West.

CONFERENCES AND ASSOCIATIONS.

MASS.—Brookfield Conference met in Ware, May 5, 6, and celebrated its 75th anniversary. The topics were: How to Use the Spiritual Forces of the Church for Evangelistic Work, History of the Conference, Fellowship with Missionaries in the Field, Support of Missions in Hard Times, Missionary Methods and Motives, The French Churches, Preaching for Our Day. Rev. A. M. Rice preached the sermon.

At the latest meeting of the Norfolk Conference last week the subjects were: A Larger Christian Life, Church Life and Work and The A. M. A. Resolutions approving the recent veto of the governor on the bill relating to churches in this State were adopted. The evening session was devoted to C. E.
Activity.

N. Y.—The Central Association was held at Ithaca, May 5, 6. The university was drawn upon for several addresses. Pres. J. G. Schurman gave an address on Christianity in the Twentieth Century. Other topics were: The Æsthetic Element in Religion, a criticism upon Schiller's philosophy,
The Relation of the Church to Crime and Its Prevention and The Ainsworth Temperance Education Law. For the first time a representative of the Free Baptist denomination was present, Dr. G.
H. Ball of Keuka College. An important step was taken by the women of the association in uniting the home and the foreign missionary interests in one association with two strong committees to advance the respective interests of the two lines of work. Mrs. H. N. Kinney was made president.
Women have for a long time been delegates to this association and have taken part in the deliberations.
The reports of spiritual interest were the most encouraging for years. Work among children has been successful. Dr. F. W. Woodbury presented the work of the A. M. A., and strong resolutions were passed sustaining that body in its defense of the Florida teachers.

O.—Plymouth Rock Conference met at Burton,
May 5, 6. This is the oldest conference on the Western Reserve and the oldest but one in the State. Fitting note was taken of Ohio's hundred years of Congregationalism. There were two sermons, a woman's missionary hour and four missionary addresses. Topics were: Congregationalists Living Up to Their Privileges, The Power of a Praying Church, The Children's Place in the Church,
The Holy Spirit in the Churches, Temperance Work Through the Churches and The Conduct of Religious Services at Funerals.

ILL.—The Rock River Association held an unusually interesting meeting, May 5, 6, in Prophetstown.
A little more than a year ago this was but a preaching station. Today there is a church of 70 members, owning a building that seats 350. The topics were: Advanced Methods in Church Work, The Ideal Layman, The Ideal Minister, Work of the Ideal Church, Christianity as Applied to Capital and Labor and to Politics.

IO.—Central Association, meeting at Belle Plaine,
May 5, 6, discussed the topics: Illustrated Services in the Churches, Christ's Kingdom for This World as well as for the Next, More Efficient Sunday School Work, Christian Citizenship, The Purpose and Mission of the Church, and Duties of Members to the Church. All the missionary societies were represented, Secretary Herrick of the Education Society giving his stereopticon lecture on Light and Shade Among the Rockies.

The meeting of the Mitchell Association at Clear Lake, beginning May 5, was preceded by a Sunday school convention. Rev. C. C. Otis preached the sermon. Prof. Graham Taylor, D. D., of Chicago, gave an address on Bringing Christianity to Bear on Life. Other topics of special interest were: a review of Dr. Brand's The Beasts of Ephesus, The Religious Horizon, How to Care for Young Converts, and Personal Work. Missions found a place in the women's hour and in the Endeavor session.

NEB.—The Omaha Association met at Wisner,
May 5, 6. A freshly painted edifice, new carpets and a large local audience welcomed the delegates, who were not numerous, not one of the Omaha churches being represented, perhaps because the place of meeting was far from central. Yet the meeting was one of interest and profit. The first half day was devoted to a Sunday school conference. Rev. Samuel Pearson preached the sermon.
Reports from the churches and of revivals were encouraging. A profitable woman's hour, addresses on Aimless Preaching, Aimless Hearing, and Home Missions, with a report for the National Council completed the program.

CLUBS.

MASS.—The Essex Club considered at its last meeting, in Salem, May 11, The Relation of the Family to the Churches, with an address by Rev.
S. L. Bell. It called out spirited discussion.

IND.—The May meeting of the Indianapolis Club was held May 5, in the parlors of Plymouth Church.
The women provided the repast. Prof. D. C. Brown of Butler College read an interesting paper on The Misanthrope in Literature.

NEW ENGLAND.

Boston.

Park Street. That there is friction between the pastor, Rev. Dr. I. J. Lansing, and not a few of the members is undeniable, but the accounts in the secular newspapers have misrepresented many facts.
The action taken at a church meeting last week, even though it prove to be irregular, will doubtless draw forth from Dr. Lansing a statement as to his intentions, and give him an opportunity to state his reasons for acting as he has.

Berkeley Temple. The closing of the second year of the School of Applied Christianity was observed last Sunday. Dr. C. A. Dickinson preached a sermon appropriate to the occasion, and Rev. Lawrence Phelps, the principal, gave an address. The need of laymen active in church work and practical training for such activity were the themes enlarged upon. The Senior Class of the school numbers seven.

Immanuel. Last week Dr. C. H. Beale was tendered a reception in honor of the completion of the second year of his pastorate. Hundreds of friends and parishioners congratulated the pastor in an informal way and neighboring brother pastors enjoyed the good fellowship of the evening. After the collation bright speeches and musical selections were a pleasant part of the program.

Central. Last Sunday afternoon the first of a series of vesper services was held at four o'clock in place of the usual Sunday evening worship.
This arrangement will continue through the warmer months, and the services will be largely choral in character. The pastor, Dr. E. L. Clark, will preach.

Massachusetts.

HYDE PARK.—Of the 43 latest accessions 38 were on confession, making the present enrollment 730, of whom 240 have been received during the three and a half years' pastorate of Dr. A. W. Archibald.

WINCHESTER. First.—Following closely upon a series of gatherings for Christian instruction, six young people united with the church at the last communion. The pastor, Rev. D. A. Newton, continues his classes and other accessions are expected.

DANVERS.—Maple Street has voted unanimously to adopt individual communion cups.

ANDOVER.—Free. This church, Rev. F. A. Wilson, pastor, celebrated its 50th anniversary May 7.
The feature of the afternoon service was the historical address by Rev. W. G. Poor of Keene, N. H.
Supper was served in the vestry. At the evening service addresses were given by former pastors, Rev. W. B. Brown of Orange, N. Y. (1850–55), Prof.
G. F. Wright of Oberlin (1872–81) and Rev. F. B.
Makepeace of Springfield (1881–88). The present pastor read letters from two other former pastors,
Rev. S. C. Leonard (1859–65) and Rev. E. S. Williams
(1870–72). Dr. E. Winchester Donald of Boston spoke of the fact that the church was founded in anti-slavery days to stand for freedom and for the new cause of temperance. Dr. Donald spoke of his own personal relations with the church and acknowledged his indebtedness to it. A few other brief addresses followed.

LOWELL.—Kirk Street. An interesting occasion last week was the ordination of Rev. G. M. Ward, son of one of the deacons of the church and formerly general secretary of the C. E. Society, in which capacity he traveled over nearly the whole country and made many warm friends. Mr. Ward has now graduated at Andover Seminary in mature life and has accepted a call to the presidency of Rollins College, Florida.——Pawtucket. Rev. W. D.
Leland has completed three years of labor with this church, and in his anniversary sermon congratulated his people upon the hopeful outlook for the future. The society is soon to build a new house.
——Rev. G. F. Kenngott preached an opening sermon last Sunday in Mechanics' Hall to a large congregation.

PEPPERELL.—After a recent address by Mrs. I. V.
Woodbury of the A. M. A. a collection of $31 was taken. Pledges of $100 have now been received, giving the church two shares in the jubilee fund for paying the debt of the society.

WORCESTER.—Pilgrim. Among the 25 persons received to membership May 3 was a man 84 years of age and a child of eight, both on confession.
There has been a large increase since January in the number of sittings taken. Attendance and interest in the prayer meeting has been increased by having the membership grouped alphabetically, each group in turn being responsible for the meeting.——Union. Dr. H. A. Stimson, formerly a pastor of the church, supplied the pulpit May 3 at the farewell service before the consolidation of this church with Salem Street, also the farewell service in the old house, which has been sold.——Salem

Street. The council called May 8 to dismiss the pastor, Rev. S. A. Harlow, voiced an appreciative tribute to his scholarly and spiritual work during his 18 months' pastorate. Immediately following, a second council convened which reviewed the proceedings of each church, expressed its approval and declared the consolidation into one church consummated. By act of the legislature upon petition therefor, the two societies have also been united. Thus passes from the roll the separate existence of two old churches of splendid achievements and honorable record. The united church will be known as the Union Church, and has a membership of 757. ——At the Ministers' Meeting, May 4, Rev. Alexander Lewis presented the work of the Institutional Church.

SPRINGFIELD.—Eastern Avenue. The need of congregational training for church music was recently emphasized in a lecture by Prof. P. H. Buechler, who will for a week conduct two classes in singing each day, for the children in the afternoon, for the adults in the evening.

WEST SPRINGFIELD.—First. The parish has sold the parsonage and voted to build a new one. At a recent meeting the financial report showed a marked improvement over the previous year. Rev. S. K. Perkins is pastor.

HOUSATONIC.—The 17 additions at the last communion are to some extent the fruits of the recent meetings held by Rev. H. W. Pope. Rev. A. J. Benedict is pastor.

LENOX.—The presentation of the new pulpit has led to a desire for general interior renovation of the audience-room and the meeting house is closed for a few weeks.

Maine.

EASTPORT.—The pastor, Rev. C. S. Holton, has been earnest to secure good local government, independent of party politics. In co-operation with others a circular has been sent throughout the county upon civic federation.——Evangelist Gale is to hold meetings here and preparatory work is being done. About $200 have been paid on the debt, one-half of it being an Easter offering.

GRAY.—Rev. E. M. Cousins finds encouragement in his new field. The morning congregations and Sunday school have largely increased, while the evening attendance at a series of talks to young people has increased threefold. He is also to supply, about three fourths of the time Sunday afternoons, in a neighboring town where there is no regular preaching.

LITTLE DEER ISLE.—Rev. Charles Whittier has spent four Sundays here and in the neighborhood, visiting and holding meetings. With the assistance of Rev. J. S. Richards and others a church was formed April 24, and plans made to build as soon as the committee can make arrangements.

BANGOR.—Hammond Street. A recent pleasant affair was a reception and supper given the "shut-ins" of the society by the United Workers. Conveyance was furnished where needed and many aged and invalid friends enjoyed a beautiful afternoon.

SANFORD.—The large attendance at services has necessitated the outlay of $125 for suitable apparatus for ventilation by means of an electric fan. Every six minutes the air is entirely freshened.

FORT FAIRFIELD.—Deacon Stevens, who recently died, had been deacon of this church for 40 years, during which he had never missed a communion season.

BATH.—Winter Street. A centennial souvenir has been published, making a full and comely pamphlet of much local historical value.

BRIDGTON.—The church has voted to rebuild the chapel burned last winter, also to remodel and re-seat the meeting house.

UNION.—Mr. T. P. Gales will begin his pastorate about June 1. He came from the northern part of England to Bangor Seminary.

New Hampshire.

CROYDON.—The pastor, though over threescore years old, is active in holding services in the different parts of the town. He has resumed Sunday services at Ryder's Corner, three miles over the mountains. A union Sunday school is also maintained. After a four years' suspension the C. E. Society has been reorganized and its prospects for the future are encouraging. The Sunday evening service already gives evidence of the new interest and zealous efforts.

MARLBORO.—Recently a unique celebration was held in honor of the 50th anniversary of Cyrus S. Moors joining the choir. For 40 years he has been chorister. Speeches were made by ex pastors and friends. Handsome presents were also given and an original hymn and poem were used. Rev. J. S. Colby, pastor for a little over three years, read his resignation May 3, but the church has refused to accept it.

LANCASTER.—Additions are being made to the $3,000 left by the late Mrs. Benton, and a new chapel will be erected the coming season.

MANCHESTER.—First. Mr. E. L. Baldwin began his 40th year of service as organist and conductor of the music May 3.

FRANKLIN.—Thirteen persons united with the church at the May communion, four on confession. Those uniting by letter came from four denominations.

HOPKINTON.—The late Sophronia Folsom left $400 to the church. The people are rejoiced in the coming of their chosen pastor, Rev. J. S. Curtis, May 17.

STRATHAM.—The church receives $1,000 from the estate of the late Dr. G. W. Dearborn of Exeter.

Vermont.

HARDWICK.—This young church is working hard to pay off the last bills on its new house of worship. An orchestra of five pieces assists at the Sunday evening services.

LYNDON.—The late Hon. B. F. Lincoln left $3,000 to this church, the income only to be used for its support.

Rhode Island.

CHEPACHET.—The semi-centennial of the church was celebrated, May 5, by morning and afternoon services and an anniversary dinner. A historical paper was read and former pastors gave reminiscences. In the afternoon Rev. Alexander McGregor preached and the Lord's Supper was celebrated. A varied musical program accompanied each session. A four-page program, illustrated by half-tone of the church and parsonage, with list of all pastors and deacons and of first officers of societies was a neat souvenir of the occasion.

WOONSOCKET.—Globe. The church has at last started the long desired mission for the Swedes and Finns. There are over 60 persons of these nationalities in the city. Rev. B. J. Thorén of Pawtucket is to have charge of the mission, assisted by Rev. J. P. Eagle of Providence. Services are held in the Globe meeting house, Rev. J. C. Alvord, pastor.

Connecticut.

NEW HAVEN.—Davenport. The services of May 3 completed 22 years of pastoral service of Rev. I. C. Meserve with this church. The total membership is above 560, about 47 having been added since Jan. 1. The edifice is down town and the church has suffered by removals to an alarming extent, but it now renews its courage. The Sunday school is growing and is one of the most flourishing in the city. Mr. F. W. Pardee has been superintendent for more than 30 years and has just been unanimously re-elected.—— A Sunday School Union has been organized, of which Supt. W. R. Downs is president. At the first meeting the subject was, What Has Been Tried Successfully and Unsuccessfully in Your School?——United. Last week, Sunday evening, an address was given by Miss Charlotte T. Sibley, on Over Palestine Hills on Horseback. The Sunday school collections during May will be for Tuskegee Normal Institute.

NAUGATUCK.—As the borough stands ready to take the present site of the meeting house for park purposes, a new edifice will probably be erected.

MIDDLE STATES.

New York.

BROOKLYN.—Bushwick Avenue. The new edifice was dedicated May 4 before a large congregation. Dr. J. B. Clark preached the sermon and Rev. W. T. Stokes offered the prayer. Dr. T. B. McLeod preached in the evening. The pastor, Rev. C. W. King, begins at this time his fourth year of work here. The lot on which the building stands was a gift of the late Adrian M. Suydam, besides a bequest of $10,000 to the church. To this the C. C. B. S. and local church extension societies each added $5,000 and the congregation raised $5,000. Every debt was provided for before work on the house began. The building is 75 feet wide and with the chapel 100 feet long. It is built of brick with terra cotta trimmings. The services continued every evening through the week until Friday, with addresses by Rev. Drs. A. J. Lyman, L. H. Cobb, R. J. Kent, S. H. Virgin and Rev. Samuel King. The membership is now 250 and the Sunday school enrolls 350 members.

JAMESTOWN.—The Swedish churches of the midland district, including parts of New York, Pennsylvania and Ohio, met in this city, April 24-27. As an example of the harmony of the meeting where 23 ministers and several delegates were present from all parts of the field, and as a sign of greater unity, Rev. Frank Nilson, the Swedish missionary of the C. H. M. S., was chosen general missionary of the combined churches and his support pledged, thus relieving the H. M. S. and at the same time leaving the churches well cared for. Mr. Nilson is a man of piety, of evangelistic power and practical wisdom. His annual report shows conversions and meeting houses built.

SCHROON LAKE.—The church has been greatly strengthened by a recent large addition. Rev. Lemuel Jones of the H. M. S. has spent four weeks in this field, and following a religious interest already existing the membership of the church has been more than doubled. For two years there has been summer preaching only. With this increased strength an effort is being made to secure a permanent pastor.

ALBANY.—Clinton Avenue at a missionary concert April 26 on Turkey took a collection of $25 to be sent to the A. B. C. F. M. for Turkey.

New Jersey.

JERSEY CITY.—Tabernacle. The church celebrated the 10th anniversary of Dr. J. L. Scudder's pastorate last week. The pastor has been specially popular among the young people, and has been identified closely with the various reform movements of the city. In the third year of his work he led the effort in his church which resulted in the burning of the mortgage, and later conceived the idea of the People's Palace, which has been such a help and strength to the work among those classes for whom it was intended. This church is now one of the strongest in the State and its influence is broad and strong.

WESTFIELD.—The Men's League continues to do good service. Largely through its efforts the attendance at evening service has been materially increased. The Sunday school is now larger than ever. A men's class has been added and the stated written examinations are a success. The past year has been prosperous, 22 persons having been added to the church, and over $2,200 having been contributed for benevolent objects. Rev. Henry Ketcham is pastor.

PLAINFIELD.—This church has placed itself upon the General Howard Roll of Honor. It recently observed what is called "our own church day." The pastor spoke briefly upon the claims of one's own church, then several laymen put the financial situation of the church before the people, and pledge cards were distributed resulting in successful returns.

ORANGE.—The church has raised two shares for the Howard Memorial Fund and the C. E. Society is raising another. The Junior Society now numbers 75 and it is doing excellent work.

NEWARK.—Belleville Avenue finds itself now more prosperous than for many years. At recent special meetings a deep interest prevailed and there were several conversions.

THE SOUTH.

Georgia.

MARIETTA.—This church rejoices in awakened interest. During a four days' meeting there were 22 conversions. The pastor, Rev. Calvin Lane, was assisted by Rev. H. H. Proctor of Atlanta. A baptismal tank was constructed in the meeting house, and before the largest congregation ever gathered with this church six persons were immersed.

ATLANTA.—First. Young converts are working in a hopeful manner and a Junior Endeavor Society has recently been organized. The spiritual prosperity of the church is being followed by financial success.

THE INTERIOR.

Ohio.

SPRINGFIELD.—First. The neighboring churches were well represented at the recent council to install Rev. E. A. Steiner. Letters, warmly commending Mr. Steiner, were read from his former church and conference in St. Paul. The pastor-elect read a clear, comprehensive and impressive statement which was so complete no questions were asked. A large congregation gathered in the evening. Dr. Washington Gladden preached an able and inspiring sermon on The Kingdom of God within Us, and other neighboring pastors had a part in the exercises, and generous greetings were given in behalf of the city churches. Mr. and Mrs. Steiner were affectionately received in a social way last Thursday evening, the lower rooms of the church being crowded, and the manifestations of Christian fellowship proving all that could be wished. The morning and evening congregations on Sunday are unusually large and increasing, and the work of the church is being prosecuted with vigor.

CLEVELAND.—Pilgrim received 57 new members, May 3, 39 on confession. Instead of the usual preparatory lecture a welcome service was held on the Friday evening previous. Brief addresses were made by the two pastors and three deacons. The room was crowded and the occasion was one of joy and interest.

PAINESVILLE.—First. The sanctuary has recently been beautified and a new carpet laid in the auditorium. Mr. L. S. Chafer has accepted the call of the church to become music director and pastor's assistant and has entered upon his work. Rev. P. W. Sinks is pastor.

Illinois.

The home missionary rallies now in progress in the State opened auspiciously in Galesburg the first Sunday in May. Dr. A. F. Sherrill made ample preparation for a great occasion and the result was all that he anticipated. The day was beautiful, the congregations large, the speakers alive and interesting and the collections beyond expectation. Mrs. Caswell, Mr. Wiard and Mr. Puddefoot literally captured the city, so far as Congregational interests are concerned. On the following evening Mr. Wiard gave a stereopticon lecture to a full house. Following the meeting in Galesburg, rallies were held at Paxton and Alton.

Indiana.

TERRE HAUTE.—Rev. J. B. Koehne recently delivered his course of Nazarene lectures, using alternately the First Congregational and First Baptist meeting houses. The congregations increased to the last.——First. The resignation of Dr. J. H. Crum was a great surprise to this congregation, which represents the leading class of people in intelligence and wealth in the city. The pastor came here seven years ago. His sermons have attracted more than ordinary attention and he has shown himself an able preacher, a constant student and an earnest Christian minister. Regret is felt in and out of the church. During the pastorate there have been large accessions to the membership, in one year over 100 uniting, and its present roll is the largest in the history of the church. A second church has also been organized in the eastern part of the city, and another mission has been opened and sustained. The benevolences have been large. Dr. Crum has been a helpful influence in the State. He has been a member of the State missionary committee and president of the Congregational Club of Indianapolis.

Michigan.

COPEMISH AND THOMPSONVILLE.—During the year's pastorate of Rev. W. A. Bockoven the work has grown from a condition of discouragement to one of hope. Several members have been added in each place and the C. E. Societies have more than doubled in membership. At Thompsonville a comfortable parsonage has been purchased and property and money are pledged to fully pay for it, and important improvements have been made in the church edifice. At Copemish the meeting house has just been moved to a more convenient position, and a basement room will be fitted up anew.

THE WEST.

Missouri.

ST. LOUIS.—Compton Hill. Dr. G. C. Adams rounded out 15 years of work in St. Louis May 5. During that time he has received 532 members on confession and 493 by letter, making a total of 1,025. The dismissions number 591, leaving a present membership of 434. The church has contributed $105,000 for current expenses and $20,000 for benevolences, an average of $8,300 per year. Dr. Adams's first congregation was composed of 26 persons, of whom 14 were children.——First. May 5 Dr. George completed his fifth year of service. When he came the resident membership was 250. Since then 286 persons have been added. The present enrollment is 454. More than $125,000 have been contributed, of which over $70,000 have been for benevolences.

Iowa.

CRESTON.—Dr. D. P. Breed's acceptance of the call to this thriving railroad center of some 8,000 inhabitants creates general rejoicing. Under the pastorate of Rev. A. J. Van Wagner a fine house of worship was erected, but the foundations of the growth and prosperity of the church were laid by Dr. N. H. Whittlesey, now secretary of the Society for Ministerial Relief. Having made provision for its home work the church is now ready for a larger share in the aggressive work of the denomination.

ROCK RAPIDS.—Rev. J. K. Nutting, acting pastor, speaks appreciatively of the faithful workers in his church. Its midweek meetings are full and interesting. Services lately held at the Methodist Episcopal church by Evangelist Garlock, though not union meetings, were participated in to some extent by Congregationalists. Ten accessions were welcomed May 3, nine on confession. Of these four were heads of families and five were young men.

NILES AND STILLWATER.—Reports from these points and from Orchard show progress under the leadership of Rev. Palmer Litts. A C. E. Society has been organized at Stillwater within a month. A house of worship is greatly needed, the schoolhouse in which services are held being crowded every fair Sunday. At Orchard the women have provided new Rochester lamps for the audience room.

ANAMOSA.—Chaplain Crocker of the State's prison gave his lecture on Crime and Its Punishment the evening of April 29. This address was so well received by the Davenport Association the preceding week that the pastor, Rev. S. F. Millikin, arranged for his people to hear it.

MUSCATINE.—Pilgrim. The annual report shows a membership of 65, of whom 20 have united during the past year—all but two on confession. The Sunday school enrollment is 254; amount raised for benevolences, $116.15. Rev. G. M. D. Slocum is pastor.

CLAY.—This church is yoked with that at Franklin for the coming year, and has arranged for preaching services half of the time. Interest is manifest and attendance is increasing.

Special services are in progress at Algona, conducted by Evangelists Cordner and Burnett, who recently closed a successful series of meetings at Alden.——The Iowa Home Missionary Society closes its fiscal year out of debt and with a few dollars in the treasury. The expenditures were $17,180 for missionary work within the year and a debt of $815 from the previous year; total, $17,995.

Minnesota.

LATHROP.—This is a typical lumber town, abounding in liquor and gambling saloons, and is perhaps the only one of 1,000 population in the State that is churchless, and till within a few weeks was destitute of regular preaching services. Rev. H. W. Parsons is now caring for the work here and at several other points. The attendance has been uniformly large, all elements being well represented, and a great change is already noticeable in the community.

BERMIDJI.—A Sunday school has been opened at this growing town just outside the Red Lake Reservation. At present there is no preaching service nor any funds in prospect to enable the H. M. S. to send a minister, though one is greatly needed. There are indications of a large immigration into the reservation when it is opened, May 15. A friend in Hartford has sent $50 for this work.

GRACEVILLE.—The house of worship has been newly papered. Work at the two out-stations, Chokio and Olivet, interrupted during the winter, has been resumed, and preparations are being made for erecting a chapel at the former place. The pastor, Rev. H. A. Cotton, travels 46 miles in making the circuit of his parish.

FARIBAULT.—The pastor, Rev. G. S. Ricker, has just completed two years of service. In that time 86 persons have been welcomed to membership, the fruits of faithful work in Sunday school, C. E. and personal lines. The pastor is now giving a course of Sunday evening discourses on Congregationalism, mainly historical.

NEW DULUTH.—Since the resignation of the pastor, Rev. W. N. Moore, the church is being supplied by Evangelist J. I. Sanford, who has been invited to remain for six months. Hard times have diminished the membership, many having moved away, but the few who remain show unfaltering courage.

ORTONVILLE.—Since the coming of Rev. G. W. Shaw growing congregations, an increase of active members in the C. E. Society, and repairs upon the parsonage are reported. This is a summer resort and the pastor is making efforts to draw visitors to the church services.

MANTORVILLE.—The church welcomes its new pastor, Rev. W. C. A. Wallar. The departing minister, Rev. Howard Mudie, has brought the work from weakness and dependence upon the Home Missionary Society to strength and self-support.

LAMBERTON.—This church with its yokefellow, Walnut Grove, has been unsupplied for some time. Rev. J. P. Campbell has visited it since the close of his work at New Ulm, and efforts are making to secure a pastor.

WALKER.—The gift of lots facilitates the erection of a chapel and an application for aid has been forwarded to the C. C. B. S. This will be the first chapel erected in this growing town in northern Minnesota.

BRAINERD.—Second. A pastor is on the ground and there are signs of progress. That section of the city is developing and the church which for a time hovered between life and death seems destined to grow.

ST. PAUL.—Bethany. Congregations have steadily increased since the coming of Rev. S. G. Arnett, and the people are being rapidly developed in Christian work and influence.

NEW ULM.—A debt incurred during the last pastorate has somewhat discouraged the church and no pastor will be called until it is paid.

At Hancock a small debt has been liquidated and the church, pastorless for six months, is to be again supplied.——Morris has a new $600 organ. The proceeds of a concert almost completes the payment for it.

Nebraska.

OMAHA.—First. Dr. F. A. Warfield entered upon his work May 3, and was greeted with a full house. All departments of church life feel the stimulus of his coming. On their arrival the preceding Friday the family were met by a large delegation and every effort was made to show cordial welcome and hearty co-operation.——St. Mary's Avenue. The communion service May 3 was impressive, 10 persons being received to membership, five on confession.

LINCOLN.—First. At the May communion service 13 new members were received, five on confession. In most cases these were heads of families and valuable accessions. This church has adopted the pleasant custom of holding a reception to new members on the prayer meeting evening after the communion.

HYANNIS.—This church, growing in influence under the pastorate of Rev. O. E. Tichnor, invites him to remain another year. It is the only church in town and no other religious service is held there Mr. Tichnor preaches once a month at Reno, 50 miles distant.

DODGE.—As the first fruits of the Billings meetings, eleven persons, nine on confession, were received to membership May 3. Rev. Arthur Farnworth is pastor.

North Dakota.

ABERCROMBIE.—Rev. E. E. Saunders closed his labors here May 1, to take up work at several points around Jamestown. Mr. W. A. Wilkinson of Minneapolis will care for the enlarging work at Abercrombie.

KELSO.—The new edifice is ready for occupancy and will be dedicated soon. Rev. N. P. McQuarrie has been untiring in his efforts in behalf of this people in connection with his work at Hillsboro.

FARGO.—Special evangelistic services opened May 5 under the lead of Evangelist Hunt of Minneapolis. All the churches unite and a rich harvest is hoped for.

GLEN ULLIN.—Rev. F. C. Emerson is doing faithful and effective work on this field, preaching also at other points.

Rev. W. H. Gimblett is assisting Rev. A. G. Young at Harvey.

Colorado.

COLORADO SPRINGS.—First. Rev. J. B. Gregg, D. D., completed, May 3, the 14th year of his service as pastor. Twenty-two persons were received into the church, five on confession. Dr. Gregg's pastorate is the longest in the history of the denomination in Colorado. During its continuance 540 new members have been received. Since the beginning of the year a flourishing Young Ladies' Missionary Society and a Boys' Brigade have been organized. In addition to its regular offering to the American Board the church has contributed since Jan. 1 $200 toward the extinction of the debt of that society. A committee has been appointed to secure plans for the building of a chapel.

PACIFIC COAST.

California.

SAN FRANCISCO.—In behalf of the new mission for the conversion of the Jews the Monday Club has appointed Rev. Messrs. W. D. Williams, John Kimball and W. H. Tuft to act with committees from other denominations.——Fourth. A Boys' Club has been organized.

Supt. L. L. Wirt of the S. S. and P. S. reports that he and Missionary Cook have organized 55 schools, six of which have developed into churches. They have also done considerable evangelistic work. In the past year these brethren have traveled nearly 30,000 miles.

The Bible Society has, in the five years just passed, given away about 14,000 Bibles, costing $4,000, to Sunday schools of all denominations in the State.

Washington.

COLUMBIA CITY.—This newly organized church of 18 members, in the suburbs of Seattle, is practically the making over to our denomination of a Methodist Protestant organization, with its $1,500 house of worship. It is the only church among a population of 350. Rev. B. F. Rattray is the pastor.

OTHER CHRISTIAN WORK.

The American Sunday School Union held its 72d anniversary in the United Church, New Haven, May 10, Morris K. Jesup, its president, presiding. Rev. Dr. Conwell, secretary of missions, and Dr. A. P. Foster, secretary for New England, made brief statements concerning the work. Mr. E. P. Kelley of the Senior Class, Hartford Seminary, and Mr. W. C. Landis of the School of Christian Workers, Springfield, will enter the service of the American Sunday School Union, the former to act as missionary in the rural districts of Massachusetts, beginning in June, the latter to work in New Hampshire, beginning in July.

The Indian Industrial League, Miss Frances C. Sparhawk, Newton Center, secretary, puts forth an urgent appeal for funds with which to provide Indians, educated and willing to work, with suitable opportunities. The Hualapa Indians and Navajo especially need aid in supplying them with tools with which to earn a living. The league has two objects: to open individual opportunities of work to individual Indians, and to build up self-supporting industries in Indian communities.

Over-Exertion of Brain or Body. Take Horsford's Acid Phosphate.

It is a wholesome tonic for body, brain and nerves. Wonderfully quick in its action.

WHAT we inherit we are not to blame for. We cannot be held responsible for the dispositions and tendencies which we derive from our ancestors, nor are we responsible for the germs of disease which may manifest themselves in our blood as a heritage from former generations. But we are responsible if we allow these germs to develop into serious diseases which will impair our usefulness and destroy our happiness. We are responsible if we transmit to our descendants the disease germs which it is possible for us to eradicate by the use of Hood's Sarsaparilla, the one true blood purifier. This medicine has power to make rich, red blood and establish perfect health in place of disease.

Cures Talk

The great cures by Hood's Sarsaparilla, recorded in the simple, truthful, convincing language of grateful men and women, with their personal recommendation of it to neighbors and friends, constitute its most effective advertising. Many of these cures are marvelous. They have given Hood's Sarsaparilla the largest sales in the world, and have made necessary for its manufacture the greatest Laboratory on earth. Hood's Sarsaparilla is known by the cures it has made—cures of scrofula, salt rheum and eczema, cures of rheumatism, neuralgia and weak nerves, cures of dyspepsia, liver troubles, catarrh—cures of all blood diseases, which prove that

Hood's Sarsaparilla

Is the One True Blood Purifier. All druggists. $1.

Hood's Pills cure liver ills, easy to take, easy to operate. 25 cents.

Great Comfort.

There are chairs for all purposes—for beauty, for convention, for comfort, for economy, for saving of space. This new design of rocker combines in one pattern almost all of these essentials.

The engraving fails to convey any idea of its shape The seat is as deep as the back is tall; the side frames are considerably longer than the hight of the back, which makes the chair long and flat upon the floor. Hight is an inconsiderable factor compared to depth.

It is built of solid red oak, with the fashionable Malachite finish, now so much in demand. The back and side frames are richly carved. The lions' heads on the arms are in full relief.

Get the effect of depth by realizing that sitting in the natural position, with extended arms, it would be impossible to reach the carved heads on the corners. The extra length of the rocker gives a very easy, slow motion.

THE BUSINESS OUTLOOK.

Bank clearings for the week amounted to ıe sum of $1,135,000,000, which demonstrates ıat the merchandise movement throughout ıe country is fair, to say the least.

Another favorable factor is the splendid rospect for cereal and cotton crops, which, tter all, are of vital importance to the pros- erity of the whole country. Less favorable onsiderations are the continued surplus ock of cotton goods, dullness in the woolen nd iron trades and a decrease in the demand r lumber at St. Louis and Minneapolis. he leather trade seems to be in the best haps, an advance in prices having taken ace this week. The movement in boots and oes is also more brisk. As to cotton goods can be stated that there has been a slight nprovement in the situation. Raw cotton as been advancing, and Fall River print oths were marked up 1-16 cent last week. hese are encouraging signs.

The business and financial world, however, awaiting the results of the Republican Con- ention at St. Louis next month. There is uch distrust of McKinley on the currency uestion and, until he comes out boldly for und money, or the Republican platform at . Louis declares unequivocally for the single old standard, business interests will move rward with caution.

THE APPEAL FROM ARMENIA.

If Lord Salisbury, and Hon. John Sher- an, chairman of the Senate Committee on oreign Relations, who recently said that if tizens of the United States will persist in oing to Turkey the United States cannot fol- w them there and protect them nor involve elf in war to punish injuries inflicted upon em, if these gentlemen chance to read a let- r written from Constantinople on April 18, y Miss Clara Barton, and sent to the Red ross officials in the United States, we hope eir consciences will trouble them and their inds grasp the fact that their courage is as r removed from hers in degree as Iceland is om Patagonia in space. Listen to her as she plies to the suggestion that she return:

I have a body of relief agents on these fields, undreds of miles away in the mountains, a housand miles from me, that I could not raw off in six weeks. The best we could all would be to abandon ten thousand poor, ck, suffering wretches to a fate that ought shock the entire world. Dying, sick, food- ss, naked and not one doctor and no medi- ne among them, whole cities scourged and ft to their fate, to die without a hand raised ve the three or four resolute missionaries, red, worn, God-serving at their posts until ey drop. The civilized world running over ith skillful physicians and not one there, no ıe to arrange to get them there, to pay ex- enses, take special charge and thus make it ossible for them to go.

And we, seeing that state of things, holding our grasp the relief we had been weeks reparing and organizing in anticipation of is, to turn back, draw off our helpers, send ack the doctors already started, give all up ecause somebody had said something, the ress had circulated it, the world had be- eved it, our disappointed committees had st heart and grown sore, struggling with an ccupation rather new to them, and the peo- e had taken alarm and failed to sustain em? Was this all there was of us? No urpose of our own? On 'change, like the rice of wheat on the market? In the name God and humanity this field must be car- ed, these people must be rescued, skill, care, edicines and food for the sick must reach em.

And it is a glad sight to my soul to think Turkish troops taking these bands of doc- rs on to Marash. They have done it, and re at this very hour marching on with them their field of labor. What does one care r criticism, disapproval or approval under rcumstances like these? Don't be troubled. Ve can carry it. We are fair financiers, not smayed, and, God helping, can save our ospitals.

We also commend to Mr. Sherman and his olleagues on the foreign relations committee ıe important statement just made by our inister to China, Mr. Denby, that, for rea- ons which he gives in the most succinct and nequivocal way, missionaries, "in the inter- est of civilization, not only ought to be tol- erated, but ought to receive the protection to which they are entitled from the officials."

WOMAN'S BOARD PRAYER MEETING

PILGRIM HALL, CONGREGATIONAL HOUSE, BOSTON, MAY 8.

Mrs. Edwin Wright presided and read Job 22. The thought emphasized was the imperative necessity on our part of giving more time in silence with the Word and its teacher, the Holy Spirit. We are too prone to remain satisfied with what we have already received. If we realized that we were to receive in order to give to others, we should be greatly stimulated to search for deeper things in the revelation. The illustration of the scientist in his intense and continued application in hope of discovery, and then his eagerness to give results to others, beautifully enforced the teaching and unfolding of this most suggestive lesson.

A glimpse of the work and workers at Brousa was given by Miss Stanwood, of Mr. and Mrs. Baldwin, the latter in charge of a girls' school in East Brousa, of Mr. and Mrs. Crawford, who have spent some months in Trebizond assisting Mr. Parmelee in relief work, of Miss Cull in charge of the girls' school in Brousa, and of Miss Griswold for several years in the same school, but who is now in Smyrna filling a gap made by Miss Harlow's return to this country.

Miss Washburn reported from Marsovan, so sorely stricken in the loss of Miss King and Mr. Smith, where the work goes on with wonderful enthusiasm in spite of the peculiar anxieties which beset many of the mission stations. Schools are full and meetings well attended. Miss Fritcher, for many years principal of the girls' school, now lies very ill at her home in Walden, N. Y , longing for the summons which shall bid her enter the celestial city.

Mrs. Schneider added her testimony to the efficiency of the blessed company of workers at Marsovan, saying: "I wish you all knew them as I do."

Mrs. Goodell read a poem by Mrs. Allen of Harpoot:

O, the blessedness of living Far away from earth's alarms!

Showing the "sweetness of abiding" to one who ever trusts "God's sheltering arms."

Mrs. Gulliver, Mrs. Capron, Mrs. Purington, Mrs. Snow and Mrs. Billings contributed to the interest of the hour.

LIFE IN THE SANCTUM.

"We have no use for bear stories," said the editor. "Our readers demand something spicy." "Well," said the man with a manuscript, "this story is about a cinnamon bear."—Sports Afield.

The entry clerk, whose bill for one of our recent cuts converted the Armenian Patriarch into "Armenian Patchwork," is a worthy follower in his proselyting methods of Abdul Hamid himself.

"Sire," announced the slave, "there is a driveling idiot below." The successful magazine editor started violently. "Show him right up," he exclaimed, with emotion. "We are constantly on the lookout for new talent." —Detroit Tribune.

A wag thought he would have some fun with the mild-mannered young man who had recently taken charge of the religious paper. "I say," he said, coming into the office excitedly, "there's a man in the street looking for you with a club." The young editor looked up pleasantly. "Is that so?" he inquired. "We make special reductions to clubs. How many subscribers has he got?" —New York Truth.

"I'm not going to let this paper be caught in any more libel suits if I know it, by George!" exclaimed the city editor, running his eye rapidly over a page of copy that lay on his desk.

And he inserted a word so that the sentence read: "Cain, the alleged murderer of Abel," etc.—Chicago Tribune.

AS WE GO TO PRESS.

Enter Book Agent: "Editor in? No? Guess I'll wait for him in his private room." Enter Editor (to office boy): "If anybody calls to see me don't let him in! Kill him!" (Rushing into private room is confronted by book agent) "Ah!" Sensation!

He bought the book.

WHAT UNIVERSITIES ARE FOR.

Universities are no longer merely students of the past, meditative observers of the present, or critics at a safe distance of the actual struggles and strifes of the working world. They are active participants in all the fundamental, progressive work of modern society. By spoken word, by pen and pencil, through laboratories, libraries and collections, through courts, churches, schools, charities and hospitals, they promote the forward movement of society and help to open its onward way —President Eliot of Harvard.

A BRIGHT REMARK.—In another column is an interesting engraving of an old-fashioned green wood rocker, now on sale at the Paine warerooms on Canal Street. Some one wittingly said of this rocker, upon seeing it the other day in the warerooms, that it looked "as enduring as the hills and almost as green." It is astonishing what a furore has been created in this country in the last year over the color of green as a fashionable shade for furnishings.

CHRISTIAN ENDEAVOR NOTES.

If societies know the birthdays of inmates of eighboring homes, asylums and hospitals, and of e aged members of their churches, they can re-ember these anniversaries with little gifts.

A member of the Sunday school committee at uburndale, Mass., is appointed each week to look ter the younger children of the primary depart-ent as they gather in their room during the last rt of the preaching service.

A Philadelphia society assumes the responsibility r one meeting each week at the Florence Critten-n Mission. It has charge of a meeting on one her evening also, and has contributed a generous nount of supplies. It gave more than $125 rough the missionary boards last year.

Utah's first convention since becoming a State as naturally the occasion for urging on the En-avorers their responsibility as citizens in view the new situation. The presence of Treasurer illiam Shaw of the United Society, Mr. Ira D. nkey and Mr. and Mrs. G. C. Stebbins was a great traction. Many of the sessions were held in a eeting house that had been built by the contribu-ons of societies. Delegates going to the conven-on at San Francisco next year were invited to end a Sunday at Salt Lake City on their way.

The floating society on board the United States eamship Charleston a year ago noted the need of home for sailors at Nagasaki, Japan, and raised nong themselves $600 for the purpose, besides edging $30 a month for the support of a manager. ith assistance from others a house has been se-red and has been dedicated as a C. E. Home, the rvices being conducted by missionaries and by e chaplain of the United States flagship Olym-a. The purpose of the home is "to afford Chris-an home comfort and to extend religious and oral influences to seamen." The board of direc-rs has as president a missionary bishop of the urch of England, and many of the members are mericans. As soon as the necessary means can found it is expected that an American manager d his wife will take charge of the house.

The preparatory meetings at the Washington onvention will be 22 in number on July 8. At the ening session the first day of the convention the esident's annual address and the secretary's re-rt will be given in the tents and denominational llies will occupy the afternoon. Christian citi-nship will occupy the evening and Saved to Serve ill be the topic for Friday. The committee con-rences will be held Friday afternoon. Evangelis-c meetings for citizens will be held in one of the nts on Friday evening and Sunday afternoon and all three tents on Saturday evening. On Satur-ay morning an outdoor praise service at the Wash-gton Monument will be followed by a procession the Capitol. There will be another outdoor serv-e late in the afternoon and the receptions and ate rallies in the evening. Saturday will also be e juniors' day and one early morning prayer eeting will be especially for them. Central Hall ill be used for some of the large gatherings, and a eeting there on Sunday afternoon will be devoted discussing the American Sunday. The denomi-ational missionary rallies also occur Sunday after-on. The exercises of the first convention of the orld's Union of Christian Endeavor will come on onday morning, and in the evening the consecra-on services in the three tents, Central Hall and veral churches.

WHEN IS A CITY GREAT?

A city is not great because it contains many dwellings and covers much territory. Its greatness does not consist in mere numbers and in commerce. Its eminence is determined by the character of its civilization and its provision for the material, intellectual and spiritual wants of its citizens. Life, liberty and property must be secured, order maintained and the law enforced. The best system and appliances of education must be provided for its children; there must be adequate means of recreation from infancy to old age; the young must be trained to habits of obedience and diligence; outlets must be provided for their physical energies, and the spectacle of young men growing up without occupation must be removed from the conscience of the community, which is violated when there is no opportunity to learn mechanical trades—the natural outlet for their physical and mental powers. The population must be properly housed, perfect sanitary conditions must prevail, the standard of living must be raised, and parks and pleasure grounds provided on a scale which will enable every dweller in the city to exclaim:

> I care not, Fortune, what you me deny,
> You cannot rob me of free nature's grace.

Schools for commercial and technical education must be provided at night, so that artisans of talent and ambition may have the opportunity to develop natural capacity to its full extent; the evil influence of demoralizing resorts must be counteracted by the opening of museums of art, science and industry, so that the population may become familiar with the highest types of beauty and the results of genius; free libraries and reading rooms must be provided on a scale demanded by the intellectual wants of an intelligent population; such provision should be made for the sick and poor that there will be no excuse for the presence of its avenues of tramps and beggars; its streets should be well paved and clean; transit should be speedy and cheap; and, above all, the churches should be conducted in a spirit so liberal as not merely to cultivate the religious instincts of men, but to exert a refining spiritual influence upon the rising generation through social organizations intended to amuse, instruct and refine.—Ex-Mayor A. S. Hewitt of New York.

DENOMINATIONAL DEFECTS.

These are not the words of Prof. George D. Herron, but an indictment drawn by Rev. Dr. Smith Baker and published in Word and Work:

Three-fourths of our Congregational churches are simply religious societies, which are run for the religious pleasure and help of their own members and into which once a week a few outsiders come to see what is going on. As a public speaker falls into a mannerism of which he is not conscious, so our churches have fallen into an unsympathetic religious life which is cold to the poor man and his family. . . . The most of our preaching has been instructive enough and orthodox enough, but it has been cold, too frequently like reading the truth from a tombstone. Our ministers have preached to the six or ten most intelligent hearers, and the nine-tenths of the people have not been reached. Instead of using their education to reach the common people, they have used the pulpit to lecture upon the truth. We preach the sermon we would like to hear and foolishly think what we like is what the people enjoy. If one will imagine himself a mechanic and listen to the average sermon heard in at least one-half of our pulpits each Lord's Day, he will realize how out of touch with the common people the most of our sermons are.

It is the people that now rule, and unless God live in them and rule the people the end of all our struggles, the good of all our boasted progress, will be chaos.—Principal Fairbairn.

THE CONGREGATIONALIST

Boston Thursday 21 May 1896

REV. NEHEMIAH BOYNTON, D. D.

Recently of Boston; now of Detroit.

AT the present day you can approach a truly religious man and face him with any amount of discouraging statistics. You can tell him that fewer people are attending church. You can point to the mighty power of the press and say that that power is increasingly used for the purposes of evil, and still, after you have said your worst, you cannot compel your religious man to believe the worst or to believe that that mighty agency is to have any other power than to fulfill the purposes of God in the world. You can point to the institutions of religion. You may say, "Here is a flaw or here is a defect"; you may say that religion is a failure and that life is not worth living; and still the man who has been introduced to God will only smile at your words. He knows, because he knows God, that this universe of ours is, in spite of its defects, but fulfilling the great, the divine will of him who was and is and is to be. And the spirit of a great hopefulness will take possession of the soul of a religious man just in proportion as he finds himself in the presence of these things which are dark and discouraging. He will confess that so far as the universalities of life are concerned nothing is plainer than this, that God, the God of love, still holds his universe, in every department, in the hollow of his hand; that his will is to be done in earth as in heaven, and that his kingdom is to come here that it may come there.—From a sermon by Dr. Boynton.

EDUCATION.

—— Union College will conduct a summer school at Saratoga, July 6–Aug. 14, for men and women, without examination. Each course will be equivalent to one term of a three-hour course in the college. The languages, mathematics and a few scientific subjects are offered.

—— Not unmindful of their debt to the benefactor of Whitman College, the citizens of Walla Walla, Ore., have forwarded a cane to Dr. Pearsons made from an apple tree grown from seeds carried from New York in 1835 and planted on mission grounds in 1836. The trees are still growing. The cane is handsomely mounted and appropriately inscribed.

—— Mr. William Deering still continues to show his interest in the prosperity of the Northwestern University at Evanston. Last week he added to his previous gifts of more than a quarter of a million dollars nearly as much more. A portion of the sum is to be used as an endowment, the remainder, after the deficiencies in certain losses which are temporary in their nature are made up, is to be devoted to the erection of a building for an academy to be known as Fisk Hall, in memory of the efficient principal of the academy. The gift was made without consultation with any of the authorities and took every one by surprise. It has been made at a time when funds are greatly needed and will tide the university over a very hard place in its career. In numbers the school was never more prosperous.

—— Atlanta University at its approaching Commencement will inaugurate a series of conferences of its graduates to discuss the condition of Negroes living in cities. There are about 1,250,000 of such Negroes, or one-sixth of the entire Negro population of the country. Their condition differs widely from that of the plantation Negroes, and gives rise to a set of problems of great interest and importance not only to themselves but to the white race as well. These problems are being carefully studied by some of the graduates of the university, and their investigations will form the basis of the proposed conferences. As a large majority of the graduates are working for the uplifting of their race in the cities and larger towns of the South, their opportunities for such investigations are unrivaled, and it is hoped that some valuable results may be secured. The special subject of the first conference will be the reduction of mortality among Negroes living in cities. Carefully compiled data as to the present high death-rate will be presented, its causes will be sought and remedies suggested.

FOR A SUMMER HOUSE.—The time has come when our columns are gradually filling up with advertisements of the summer, but among all the different subjects covered by this summer advertising there is nothing so interesting as the "Delft" furniture for summer cottages, which has been introduced this season by the Paine Furniture Co. In another column of this paper may be seen an engraving of a "Delft" chiffonier.

THE flying visit of our managing editor the other day to Farringdon Hall in London, the headquarters of English Congregationalists, made us doubly sure of the welcome which our brethren across the water are preparing for the members of The Congregationalist's Pilgrimage which sails June 4. The English committee, that day in session, was almost overwhelmed with invitations from those who would pay social attention to the American company, and, as their stay is necessarily limited in time, it was decided that some of the proffered pleasures would have to be foregone. There will be, however, an ample supply of interesting functions, including a special service at St. Paul's, followed by afternoon tea at Archdeacon Sinclair's, a reception at Dr. J. G. Rogers's church in Clapham and a somewhat more elaborate gathering of the same nature at Farringdon Hall, which will represent the united hospitalities of the London churches. Special escortage through Westminster Abbey is also to be provided and, if time permits, there will be a drive to Highgate, a delightful suburb of London, rich in historic associations. The musical excellence of the Sunday services at Union Chapel, Islington, arranged with the Pilgrims especially in mind, will doubtless attract many of them. The mayor of Plymouth has solicited an opportunity to receive the Pilgrims in a formal way and at almost every prominent point in England which the party is to visit special courtesies are being extended. We had personal assurance from the American ambassador, Mr. Bayard, that he would be present at Gainsborough, June 29, when the party is to have a share in the laying of the corner stone of the new church. Moreover, our representative at the court of St. James also told us that he was looking forward to the occasion with much personal anticipation. It is possible that a large delegation of London Congregationalists may join the American Pilgrims at Gainsborough for that particular ceremony. The editorial staff of The Congregationalist will be represented in the membership of the party by Dr. Dunning and Rev. Morton Dexter and by Miss Frances J. Dyer, editor of the Home department, and Mr. Alfred Dawson, our London representative.

Unfortunately it is one of our fellowship who has drawn down upon him the just condemnation of the intelligent by his exaggerated estimate and public proclamation that one of our Massachusetts manufacturing towns with a population of 84,000 has 7,000 women who are leading immoral lives. The trouble with such sweeping statements is that they are absolutely incapable of verification. Every now and then, for instance, some one asserts publicly that from seventy-five to ninety per cent. of the young men of the country never attend church. Such generalities, based on no careful investigation and without defining exactly the terms used, make cool statisticians of the type of Carroll D. Wright and Dr. S. W. Dike weary.

The Methodist Episcopal journals, commenting upon the decision of the General Conference to refer the question of admitting women as lay delegates to the annual conferences again, generally interpret it as a triumph of grace, common sense and just regard for regular constitutional procedure. We suspect there will not be the same degree of unanimity respecting the retirement of Bishops Bowman and Foster from active service on the Board of Bishops, for the manner of doing, what most would probably describe as a necessary act, does not seem to have been considerate of the feelings of those most vitally concerned, viz, the veteran servants of God and the church. The favor with which the committee on episcopacy looked on the plan to elect a Negro as bishop has not found response among the delegates, for although Prof. J. E. Bowen of Atlanta, an educated and talented teacher and a worthy representative of the Afro-American people, received a large vote on the first two or three ballots it soon became apparent that he could not win.

Dr. James Spurgeon has recently resigned the presidency of the Pastors' College in London created by his distinguished brother. His position within the circle of which Pastor Thomas Spurgeon is now the center was becoming impossible, and his withdrawal sooner or later was inevitable. The Pierson affair was the culminating point in a long and painful drama, straining the relations between uncle and nephew to the breaking point. Dr. Spurgeon elected to publicly submit his resignation in the midst of the Pastors' College Conference, giving as his reasons difference with his co trustees of the college, and the knowledge gathered from the proceedings of the last meeting of the Tabernacle Church that as president of the college he had not its hearty support. In the course of his speech he let fall some provocative sentences, but Mr. Thomas Spurgeon, who presided over the meeting, exercised wise self restraint in declining to reply to his remarks. Dr. James Spurgeon is a man of considerable ability, and he unquestionably rendered valuable service to his brother. It is a pity that he should have to go, and the manner of his going is still more to be deplored; but he has an unfortunate knack of making himself personally unpopular with many people, and it is certainly better for one who is out of sympathy with the present pastoral arrangements of the church to sever official connection with its institutions. Mr. Thomas Spurgeon and his assistants will now have a clear field, and he must be a very mean-spirited person who does not wish one who has shown such a level head and a good heart continued success in his great undertaking.

The large circle of persons interested in Dr. John H. Barrows's visit to India, and his forthcoming series of lectures there, will be glad to learn that the nearer he approaches to his destination the stronger grows his conviction that the peculiar kind of work marked out for him will prove acceptable and helpful to the high class audience for which his lectures are particularly designed. He expects to remain in Germany until December, when he will set his face toward the East, having improved the intervening time in equipping himself more fully for his task. He ran down to Paris, three weeks ago, to confer with gentlemen there in regard to holding, in connection with the world's fair in 1900, a gathering similar to the Parliament of Religions at Chicago in 1893. While in Paris he was the recipient of conspicuous social attentions from men representing clerical and lay, business and professional interests in the French capital. Dr. Barrows has consented to give occasional glimpses to our readers of what he is seeing and hearing on this unique journey of his.

Here are the exact facts with reference to the Whitman College endowment fund, and those who believe that this institution, so strategically located and so manifestly a creature of divine Providence, ought to be properly equipped should face the situation and come speedily to its relief. On May 1 the contributions in cash and pledges, including the $25,000 which the education society undertook to raise, had reached the sum of $103,712. Of this amount $50,000 were raised in Walla Walla, conditioned on securing Dr. Pearsons's gift. The sum still remaining is $46,287, and this must be secured by June 17 to comply with the conditions set by Dr. Pearsons. As yet no large single gift has been made in the East. A private letter just at hand from the indefatigable President Penrose says: "I do not believe the God of Marcus Whitman and of Cushing Eells, in whose name the college was founded, will suffer it to fall now after these years of faithful service just as a greater opportunity for service opens before it. The students last week made this crisis the subject of special prayer."

The Christian Observer (Presbyterian) of Louisville, which recently called the American Missionary Association "the American Miscegenation Association," is not alone in its opposition to the education of the Negro. Here is the Richmond Christian Advocate (Methodist) of May 14, from which we cull the following choice, Christian, humane sentiments:

> Wise and brave men would have dealt with the negro as a negro. Our code tinkers became infected with the Northern notion of a negro—that he is a white man with a sooty skin. . . . We have legislated upon the theory that a negro, with only two removes from a man-eating beast of the lowest type of intellect, could achieve in a month what the Webster species could attain only in ages. . . . The robbery of the white man has been a curse to the negro and the State. The African can never in the South enter into the professions where education can be of use. . . . The negro is without gratitude. He always enlists his ballot against economy in public affairs. He murders right and left, without any sign of remorse or concern. This progeny of imported Cannibals are in our midst, etc.

We take the liberty of saying that the "Northern notion" of a Negro is that skin has nothing to do with manhood. The Advocate apparently expects from a race debauched by servitude and robbed by white Virginians obedience to a higher code of ethics than its masters revealed when they were in power. If most Southern preachers had less concern for "sound doctrine" and more zeal for elevating the morals and enlarging the horizon of the Negroes, many of "the sons of the freedmen" about whom the Advocate now raves would not be assaulting women or loafing about railway stations, village stores or city corners. Fortunately, Dr. Lafferty of the Advocate represents a type of Southern editor that is passing away, and the more intelligent of the whites realize that even if, granting it for the sake of argument only, the Negro is "merely a talking gorilla," the South cannot afford to permit him to remain so.

COMITY IN FELLOWSHIP.

As an outcome of the recent unhappy affairs in which Rev. C. O. Brown, who has just left the pastorate of the First Congregational Church in San Francisco, was concerned, the Bay Conference of churches has suspended him from fellowship. After apparently deliberate examination, including a sufficient adjournment, it voted to suspend Dr. Brown "until such time as in the judgment of this conference he shall have lifted from himself the burden of suspicion and doubt resting upon his reputation, and shall have proved himself worthy to be restored to the fellowship of the churches.

The Dubuque (Iowa) Association of churches immediately adopted resolutions which, after a preamble, say:

> Resolved, That we view with deep regret the manifest unfairness and great injustice which has been done our brother by the Bay Association.
>
> Resolved, That in the name of justice we urge these brethren to reconsider what seems to us an unwise and hasty action.
>
> Resolved, That we extend to Rev. Charles O. Brown our sympathy, our confidence and our Christian greetings, and, furthermore, the assurance that within the bounds of our association he will always find a hearty welcome; and
>
> Resolved, That these resolutions be spread upon our records and a copy forwarded to Dr. Brown, to the Bay Association and to our denominational papers.

As one of the "denominational papers" thus invoked we are called upon for our opinion. There is, indeed, a grave question of comity which ought to be discussed.

Did the Bay Conference of churches transcend its rightful powers? No. The action of the National Council in 1886, although not law, doubtless expresses Congregational principle. It says that standing in our ministry depends upon three things—church membership, ordination and "reception as an ordained minister into the fellowship of the Congregational churches in accordance with the usage of the State or territorial organization of churches in which the applicant may reside, and such standing is to be continued in accordance with these usages." The Bay Conference in its constitution expressly takes charge of ministerial standing. Dr. Brown was aware of that fact when he became a member of that conference. Neither he nor any other person had any right to allege want of jurisdiction. In the exercise of this admitted right the denominational standing of Dr. Brown was suspended. The action was taken by those among whom he lived, by the churches in sufficient numbers to constitute a conference, extensive in territory and dignified in character. The internal comity of the denomination had left the question, in the first instance, to that conference.

Although the Dubuque Association is silent upon the matter, it is possible that the question may be raised whether the Bay Conference was debarred from action by the prior action of a council called by the First Church for its own enlightenment, and upon the request of its pastor. We think not. (1) The established usage in California explicitly places questions of fellowship in the custody of territorial conferences of churches, and no single church can rightfully, through a council of its own selection, anticipate and prevent action by the whole body of churches which has fellowship in charge; but (2) there was no antagonism. The action of the Bay Conference seems to have been in exact pursuance of the result of council. That council, while deciding that the evidence did not sustain the serious criminal charge, expressly refused to exculpate him from suspicion caused by certain facts which appeared in the hearing. The Bay Conference was in harmony with this decision of a question of fact.

The Dubuque Association proceeded, in a feeling of generous sympathy, to sit in judgment upon a sister conference. It has condemned that conference, its acknowledged peer in every respect, in harsh and severe terms. It has uttered this condemnation without real knowledge of evidence presented at the hearing, and plainly without the possibility of investigation. At a great distance from the conference whose action it condemns, it has been impossible for it to appreciate the circumstances under which the California churches acted. To our mind the course taken by the Dubuque Association has not merely violated the comity of our churches, but in its sharp condemnation has violated the principles of justice and charity. For five years Dr. Brown lived within the bounds of Dubuque Association, honorably and without reproach. We are not prepared to say that its present confidence is not amply deserved. We are by no means sure that the final result will not fully vindicate him. But we must insist that our churches had left to the Bay Conference, in the first instance, the question of ministerial standing. The action of Dubuque has, not without reason, excited the derision of other denominations. It has struck a harder blow to our polity than any outside enemy could possibly deal. Its course unfortunately is calculated rather to hurt than help the one whom it would assist. It can fellowship him within its bounds; but the churches at large will ask which is likely to be correct—the body in which he was a resident and of which he was a member in California, or one which acted without investigation on the upper Mississippi.

But an important question remains to be considered. While in the first instance the Bay Conference has the charge of its own and the denominational fellowship, is there no remedy for a possible injustice? Certainly there is. The National Council in 1886 not only acknowledged the principle which leaves local fellowship untouched, but it went on to say, "it being understood that a pro re natâ council [i. e., one called for the occasion] is the ultimate resort in all cases in question." According to this established principle Dr. Brown would have the undoubted right to demand the convening of an impartial ecclesiastical council to consider his denominational standing, and he would have the absolute right to name one-half of the churches to be invited. He would undoubtedly have the right also to object to the membership of any church from the conference which had condemned him. The Dubuque Association could itself have proposed such a method. By so doing it would have helped the brother whom its hearty and unwarranted condemnation of a sister conference, however that action may have been prompted by a generous love for a brother whom it thought to be injured, certainly has not assisted; while its recognition of an acknowledged Congregational method would have spared us the flings to which our trust in principle rather than force has in this instance left us exposed.

MINISTERIAL DIVORCE IN THE EPISCOPAL CHURCH.

The full text of Bishop Lawrence's decision, suspending Rev. S. R. Fuller of Malden, Mass., from the ministry for two years, has been given to the public but not the evidence upon which it has been based. According to the bishop's statement, the admitted facts are that Mr. Fuller sought and obtained a divorce from his first wife on the ground of desertion, the case not being contested by her, and to her he left the custody of the children. Wishing to be married again, he applied to an Episcopal rector, who asked advice of Bishop Thompson of Mississippi, to whom at the same time Mr. Fuller submitted proofs of the adultery of his divorced wife, hoping for a decision from him that she was guilty, which would clear the way for a canonical marriage, but without notifying her or allowing her a chance to defend her reputation. The civil court to which the first wife appealed has determined that Bishop Thompson did not so decide, though the officiating minister evidently believed that he had done so in some sense or he would not have proceeded to assist him in solemnizing the second marriage, and Mr. Fuller evidently believed so.

The canon law is that ministers of the Protestant Episcopal Church having a surviving wife cannot marry unless a divorce has been secured on the ground of adultery; but it is a widespread opinion in the denomination that a bishop may decide in case of divorce on other grounds that the evidence carries also proof of adultery, and this opinion Bishop Lawrence allows for though he probably does not share it.

Amid the conflicting opinions which the case has called out it is clear to us that the power supposed to reside in bishops of the Protestant Episcopal Church of extending the decisions of the civil courts in cases of divorce is a dangerous one and cannot too soon be repudiated. The peril and scandal of the case rests exactly here. It has left Mr. Fuller legally married by the civil law and suspended by his bishop for what in plain terms, from the bishop's point of view, must be called at least a grievous scandal. A secret court, such as Mr. Fuller thought he had secured, which would privately pronounce a woman who had not been heard guilty of a crime, in order to allow a minister to marry again, has no place in American church life.

Bishop Lawrence himself, according to letters published since the decision, seems to have put himself in a disagreeable position. As Mr. Fuller's adviser he approved of the form of divorce. He declined to pass upon the disputed question later on the ground that it was unjust to do so without citing the divorced wife, but he allowed another bishop to be consulted when his refusal would have stopped the marriage altogether, while in his sentence he is forced to declare and make effective the opinion which he had earlier evaded. As regards Bishop Thompson, the decision amounts to a censure in fact if not in words. As regards Mr. Fuller, he is placed in the unpleasant predicament that he must either publicly prove his first wife guilty of adultery, or he must be counted canonically guilty of what seems to the public, under the bishop's decision, very like the same offense. And the perplexing part of it to the general public must be that a marriage solemnized by the joint action of a bishop and a minister is practically pronounced invalid by another bishop and his diocesan standing committee. And what steps can the confessedly innocent party take to vindicate her rights, who, having been married by bishop and rector, now finds her status as wife so far held in doubt that it becomes a reason for the suspension of her husband from this ministry?

Mr. Fuller's own opinion of the diocesan standing committee's action and the bishop's sentence appears as we go to press. He insists, in a letter to Bishop Lawrence, upon his entire good faith and innocence of wrong in the whole transaction, refuses to submit to any condemnation or disciplinary sentence whatsoever, formally declares his renunciation of the ministry in the Protestant Episcopal Church and demands immediate deposition therefrom on the ground of that renunciation. This is a natural, though doubtless painful, step for him to take, but it leaves the questions involved in the case as much in suspense as ever. A clear definition of the powers of Protestant Episcopal bishops in divorce cases and of their mutual relations of responsibility in counsel is clearly in order.

The stream of gifts and bequests to our educational institutions widens each year, as we pointed out last week. And since we last wrote the University of Pennsylvania has received $100,000 conditioned upon its receiving $1,000,000 within a specified time; Northwestern University, Evanston, Ill., has been given property worth $215,000 by William Deering of Evanston, which will be added to its endowment fund; and Wellesley College, so deserving and hitherto not overburdened with large gifts, has been given $100,000 by the children of the late William S. Houghton of Boston. This will provide a chapel for the college, and will we hope be the forerunner and inspirer of other much-needed gifts.

A MEDITATION FOR WHITSUNTIDE.

The life of our Lord had a double climax, first at the opened tomb, whose memory every week recalls with its day of rest and worship, and then, following the quiet days of prayer and expectation, in the manifested coming of the Holy Spirit on the day of Pentecost. In God's work every consummation is also a beginning. The incarnation opens a way for the perfect life, the life for the sacrifice, the sacrifice for the resurrection, the resurrection for the brief opportunity of teaching and the gift of the life-giving and truth-revealing Spirit.

When we think of the day of his appearing, the Pentecost of the old church and the new, with its immediate fruitfulness and its promise of help for centuries to come, we are thinking at once of a completion and an initiation.

What the church most needs today is to accept and live up to the truth that she is in the era of the personal work of God's Spirit. Institutions, creeds, traditions are valuable so far, and only so far, as they express his taking of the things of Christ and showing them to us. We are not to be afraid to discard the old if through his teaching it is shown to be outworn and useless. We are not to be reluctant to accept and test the new, if it evidently belongs to the development of his purpose. Courage to receive the indications of his teaching with open mind, to accept new conclusions and break, if need be, with old convictions and prejudices, is to go hand in hand with a vital faith in his leadership, and a reverent and respectful attitude toward the beliefs and institutions of the earlier time. There is to be no delight in breaking with the past, but if need be the break is to be accepted without misgiving and without remorse.

It is always to be remembered, however, that God's methods are not violent and revolutionary. The new life grows in the conditions of the earth. The present is rooted in the past. New views of truth have come out of views the fathers taught. Behind the reformations and revivals of the ages are the prayers and efforts of those who held and practised and studied truth in quiet lives. God makes an army ready to be led before he raises up a leader. If any one imagines that he has a call to proclaim a view of truth which is contradictory to the whole experience of God's people hitherto, the chances are enormously against his message having the sanction of God's Spirit. The risk of novelty is that it may prove to be merely a transient incident in the thinking of the church, to be discarded and forgotten—one of the wrecks which strew the path of progress, to the profit mainly of students of the vagaries of the human mind.

This progress of doctrine and of life, which it is the work of the Holy Spirit to bring to perfection, must not, therefore, be considered either as detached from the past, or as incapable of discarding means which it has once found useful. At the beginning it accepted forms of worship from the synagogue and methods of polity from the ancient customs of the Hebrew people. The church in Jerusalem still worshiped in the temple. At the council of the apostles a law was made for the whole church which has since been disregarded by that church for eighteen centuries. The Sabbath Day and the Lord's Day begin side by side and then, without dispute or excitement, the older observance is merged into the full keeping of the Lord's Day, in which all that is valuable of the Sabbath is preserved, but for whose observance there is not one Bible precept.

But in all growth and through all changes there has been one Lord present with his people and one teaching Spirit, using the means and instruments appropriate to his immediate purpose and to the possibilities and surroundings of the churches. We cannot hope for full enlightenment, the day has not yet dawned for that, but the treasure house of warning and example in the past grows ever richer and fuller and the faith of the living church in the living Spirit, working in it to will and do of his good pleasure, grows stronger and brighter day by day.

ONE HUNDRED YEARS OF CONGREGATIONALISM IN OHIO.

Ohio Congregationalism is a child of sturdy growth. No one could have looked upon the faces of the men who met in their forty-fourth annual association this year at Marietta, have listened to the papers they read and the addresses they made without feeling that the principles and polity of the Pilgrims and the Puritans are in good hands. It was a happy thought of Pastor Dickinson to unite the celebration of the centennial anniversary of the organization of the church in Marietta with the exercises of the association, and thus permit the entire State to have a part in it. The memorial volume which he has prepared, and which the Ohio Congregational Historical Society will publish, will be enriched by papers contributed by men living as far distant from each other as San Francisco and Boston. The ten papers thus brought together, in addition to the information which Dr. Dickinson has gathered concerning the local church organized Dec. 4, 1796, will be a mine of wealth for the future historian.

Marietta is an interesting place to visit. For the States formed out of the territory granted the Ohio Company by the famous ordinance of 1787 it is well-nigh as sacred as Plymouth Rock for the descendants of the Pilgrims. The place where the "Pioneers" landed is marked by a granite column giving the date of the landing, Aug. 19, 1788, and the names of the heads of the families. Just up the hill is the site of the Campus Martius, or the Stockade, within which these pioneers lived during the Indian War of 1791–5. Here, too, is the oldest building in the State, the shop put up by the Ohio Company, a little one story building still in good repair. Here, too, is the house which Gen. Rufus Putnam built out of material which went into the stockade fort, where so many plans were formed which have resulted in blessings to the State and the nation. The old records of the church, with its confession of faith, are in the clear handwriting of the general. As one turns the leaves of the book the priceless value of such records is apparent.

The Marietta church was formed of good elements. It was formed after the principles of the Cambridge Platform, and thus represented Massachusetts rather than Connecticut Congregationalism. A little group of churches in this corner of the State grew up under the lead and with the help of the mother church. Though having no fellowship with other Congregational churches in the State, they remained true to the principles of the founders and to the traditions they had brought with them.

Present day Congregationalism in Ohio has been formed of various elements. There is in it this Massachusetts element of the Marietta churches. Still more prominent was the Connecticut element brought with them by the settlers on the Western Reserve, where Congregational churches were planted early in the century, which, in spite of the Plan of Union which the fathers in Connecticut favored, refused to give up the principles they had long cherished. Thus the churches were Congregational, while the ministers for the most part were content to belong to presbytery. Another element came into this church life through anti-slavery discussions, and still another through the peculiar views held by Presidents Mahan and Finney of Oberlin. Then there were the Welsh churches, no less true to the fundamental principles of our polity than the churches formed by the men and women who came from the East. Various unsuccessful efforts were made in the beginning of the century to bring these churches together in a single association or conference. Even local conferences had only a brief and feeble life.

For more than fifty years Ohio Congregationalists lived as strangers to each other. They had no organization through which they could do aggressive work. In 1852, when the present association was formed and these various elements were happily united, there were nearly 200 churches in the State, the majority of them in its northern portion. Since that union progress has been rapid. Institutions of learning like the college at Marietta, the college at Hudson, now known as Adelbert College at Cleveland, prospering so finely under the presidency of Dr. C. F. Thwing, the seminary at Painesville, the college at Oberlin and the mission work in the larger cities, especially the Slavic work in Cleveland under the direction of Rev. Dr. Schauffler, are indications of the vitality of later years. One need but compare the history of our churches the last half-century with the history of the half-century which preceded to perceive the benefits of organization. Of course, there are regrets, as there always will be, over that Plan of Union which cost us so much, but the losses have in part been made up, and under the better methods of the present day may almost disappear in the course of another half-century.

The tolerant spirit which prevails in Ohio among brethren who differ widely on many points adds immensely to the strength of Congregationalism. But with all the divergencies on minor points, there is no divergence on the fundamental principles of the gospel. All seek to be true to the same Master. Each in his own way seeks to lead men to Jesus Christ as the only and all sufficient Saviour. Those who have been accustomed to attend gatherings of Congregationalists at the East can but feel at home in a gathering like this in the valley of the Ohio and the Muskingham.

The variation from the original type of Congregationalism as seen either in Massachusetts or in Connecticut is no greater than the change in the spirit of the times has called for. It is so slight, in fact, as to make it difficult to detect any real difference between the polity as developed in the Interior and that held on the seaboard. One can but feel that the needs of East and West are the same, a spirit of completer consecration, of greater self-sacrifice, of larger benevolence, and of unwearied patience in the discharge of duties, which press alike upon all who call themselves the servants of Christ, whether they live in New England or in the far West. Home and foreign missions, Christian education, the saving of cities through the leavening influence of the gospel, the adaptation of work through the church to every phase of present need demand efforts and means which might well appall were not the promised results so full of certainty and hope.

UNRESTRAINED INDIVIDUALISM; OR "THE SOCIAL GOOD."

Cardinal Manning, whatever his defects as a teacher and priest may have been, won the sympathy of the masses in his last days by standing as their champion in contests involving their right to receive a living wage. Quietly but surely Bishop Potter of the Protestant Episcopal diocese of New York has been forging to the front as a Christian clergyman willing and competent to adjudicate in labor contests and eager to settle them by the ethics of Christ as well as by man's sense of justice. But he has seldom, if ever, made a decision more clearly revealing his courage, or more significant, than the one rendered last week as arbitrator between the lithographers of New York city and their employers. He decides in favor of the employers on the point involving the number of hours of labor per week, and in favor of the employés in their demand for the abolition of piecework and a minimum scale of $18 per week, less than which no competent workman is to receive.

This decision may or may not be just. Piecework may or may not be permissible and conducive to "the social good." The point to be noted is that Bishop Potter in rendering his decision does not pose as a compromiser, but as an arbitrator, as a judge. He says:

> I do not see how there can be any compromise between opposing principles. If, nevertheless, the arbitrator or referee is required to give a decision, it seems to me that he must consult his highest conscience as to which of the opposite tendencies makes for the social good, and side with one or the other of the parties accordingly. In the interest of arbitration as a means of settling labor disputes this point should be clearly stated, so that the distinction between arbitration and compromise may come to be recognized. . . . I regard the abolition of piecework in the lithographers' trade and a fixed wage, with the provisions above stated, as measures in harmony with the tendencies that make for social progress, and therefore decide in favor of the men on these points.

Note especially the words which we have italicized. They come with the authority of a Christian teacher, speaking as he believes for his Master, to the heads of thirty-nine firms with a capital of $10,000,000, saying: Halt in your competition. Consider the social good as well as personal pecuniary profit.

GOD OUR COMFORTER.

This is one of the sweetest attitudes which God has revealed himself as assuming towards us. "As one whom his mother comforteth" is one of the inspired descriptions of the troubled believer receiving divine consolation. No picture is more beautiful in itself or its significance than this one drawn from the everyday occurrences of domestic life. A little child, hurt or frightened, nestling sobbing in its mother's arms with a loving face smiling down upon it and gentle tones soothing it back to peace and happiness—so, says the sacred Word, our heavenly Father comforts his troubled children and cheers them.

Grown-up children often are the most childish of all, and none of us ever outgrow the need of divine comforting. When temptations assail, when sorrows engloom, when hopes fail, when all which this world can give proves empty, we should go distracted were it not for the relief which we find in telling everything to God and in being reassured by him. He comforts us by brightening our skies, by strengthening our hands, by opening for us fresh resources, and, most and best of all, by sending to us his spirit of consolation and cheer, by showing us new meanings in his Word and by perceptibly drawing near to bless us when we pray.

We should be ashamed to receive such comfort unappreciatively. And we can testify to our sense of its preciousness by seeking it often, by bearing witness to others of its sweetness, and by trying earnestly to deserve it. Especially must we strive to comfort others in their need, and not merely from a sense of duty but with something of that deep and unfailing sympathy and love which God shows so freely to us. To receive comfort and to refuse to give it in turn betrays a selfish heart indeed.

CURRENT HISTORY.

Domestic Politics.

Republican State conventions held in Missouri, West Virginia, Washington, North Carolina and Wyoming have indorsed Mr. McKinley. The Delaware convention refused to commit itself to his candidacy and split. The North Carolina convention indorsed bimetallism, but this is counted as a gain for conservatism, for it was feared that a free coinage of silver plank would be adopted. Missouri and Washington came out unequivocally against the free coinage of silver, the result in Washington being especially notable as the State now has two silver senators at the capital. The Colorado Republicans, in State convention assembled, rejected the advice of Senator Wolcott, will not send him to the national convention as a delegate, and gave Senator Teller full authority to lead in a bolt from the St. Louis convention should its plank on monetary standards not be satisfactory to him and his free silver constituents.

The result of these conventions makes it more and more apparent that unless a decided reaction against Mr. McKinley, headed by business men and not by a boss like Mr. Platt of New York, sets in, Mr. McKinley is foreordained to be nominated at St. Louis. There are, however, some signs of such a reaction so led, caused by Mr. McKinley's shifty record in Congress and his silence now, and prophets with memories are citing the rejection by former Republican conventions of men who a month before seemed to have as strong a grip on the delegates as Mr. McKinley has now. Mr. McKinley's friends excuse his sphinxlike attitude by the statement that the candidate has no business to shape the platform; they assert unqualifiedly that he will stand squarely on a gold platform if it is formulated. His critics affirm that his silence now is causing depression in business at home and mistrust of our credit abroad, and that the American people love a man of conviction rather than a trimmer and straddler. The American Protective Association has withdrawn its boycott of Mr. McKinley; its supreme council now places him in line with other Republican candidates as worthy of support, and declares specifically that he is in full sympathy with the aims of the proscriptive association. Such an indorsement as this, of course, is a two edged sword. It injures as well as strengthens his candidacy. Cardinal Gibbons's latest utterance shows how Roman Catholic voters may act. He says:

Much as I would regret the entire identification of any religious body as such with any political party, I am convinced that the members of a religious body whose rights, civil and religious, are attacked will, naturally and unanimously, espouse the cause of the party which has the courage openly to avow the principles of civil and religious liberty according to the Constitution. Patience is a virtue, but it is not the only virtue. When pushed too far it may degenerate into pusillanimity.

The National Legislature.

The Senate has passed the River and Harbor Bill, carrying appropriations of more than $12,000,000 and authorizing contracts for projects involving an aggregate liability of more than $50,000,000. The vote of 57 to 9 in favor of this bill will serve to accentuate the expected veto by President Cleveland. Mr. Dupont of Delaware has been refused membership in the Senate, the former Republicans—but now silverites—Messrs. Jones and Stewart of Nevada, casting the decisive votes against Mr. Dupont, supposably for fear that he would strengthen the anti-silver forces in the Senate. The Senate has done well to pass the act making one year's residence in a territory a prerequisite to obtaining a divorce there. The House committee on liquor traffic, Hon. E. A. Morse of Massachusetts, chairman, has reported favorably on the plan to appriate funds with which a worthy commission may make an investigation of the whole subject of the extent and economic and moral aspects of the traffic in intoxicating liquors. This is a step forward, as hitherto the House has been the conservative body when the Senate has been willing to proceed. Whether the findings of such a commission would have the weight of those which will come sooner or later from a self-selected committee of experts now at work on the same problem is an open question. It is certainly most desirable that such an investigation should be made and made by the right sort of men.

The United States and Turkey.

Mavroyeni Bey, the Turkish minister in Washington, has been recalled, and the State Department has been advised by Mr. Riddle, in charge of our affairs at Constantinople, that Mustapha Bey, an assistant in the Turkish Foreign Office, has been appointed his successor. More than this concerning his personality cannot be stated now. Mr. Terrell, our minister to Turkey, who had gone to Texas, his native State, on a furlough, was summoned back to Washington last week to confer with Secretary Olney, President Cleveland and a delegation of representative American citizens respecting affairs in Turkey. It is gratifying to know that the Administration is not being left to drift along without any pressure during the present crisis, but is being made to feel in a quiet, but effective way, that there are Christian laymen in this country who intend to throw the weight of their great influence as leaders of commerce and men of affairs in impressing upon the officials at Washington that as in the past a firm and consistent policy must be outlined and maintained in all our present and future dealings with the sultan. When men like William E. Dodge, ex-Minister to Russia Andrew D. White, Everett P. Wheeler, A. E. Orr and men of that caliber wait upon Secretary Olney and President Cleveland and ask for a certain course of action, which it is not politic to disclose now, but which it may be understood is thoroughly American and calculated to conserve the interests of all our citizens in Turkey, then the Department of State is made to realize that a new force has entered the contest which cannot be ignored as safely as the deliverances of Congress or ecclesiastical bodies have been. That there is a strong committee of Christian laymen organized and at work now to conserve the interests of Christian missions in Turkey is a fact which has not been widely heralded, nor need it be, but from this time on we hope to note a decided stiffening in our national policy and a bettering of conditions in Turkey, where already a slight improvement may be noted, as the pressure of the Powers upon Turkey last week called forth orders that forced conversions to Mohammedanism must cease. The patriarch of Armenia still holds his position in spite of all his enemies within and without the Armenian Church, but there come distressing rumors of a renewal of the revolutionary agitation by the Huntschagists later in May.

Electrical Energy Directly from Coal.

Prof. W. W. Jacques, a graduate of Johns Hopkins, who has studied in European schools and is now employed by the American Bell Telephone Company as an electrician, claims to have discovered that "if oxygen, whether pure or diluted as in air, be caused to combine with carbon or carbonaceous materials, not directly, as in combustion, but through an intervening electrolyte, the potential energy of the carbon may be converted directly into electrical energy instead of into heat," and Professors C. R. Cross of the Massachusetts Institute of Technology and Henry A. Rowland of Johns Hopkins University, two of the highest authorities in this or any other country, not only acknowledge the truth of Professor Jacques's claim, but give him the additional credit of having perfected and patented a process by which the great discovery can begin to work an industrial revolution compared with which that effected by the steam engine will seem paltry. For, as Professor Cross states in his report on the discovery, "It is, perhaps, fair to say that we may expect the carbon electric generator to yield ten times as much electricity per pound of carbon as does a good average steam engine dynamo plant." The best devices today enable producers of electricity to secure only five per cent. of the potential energy of the fuel consumed, but here is a discovery that multiplies the energy developed and lessens the cost of maintenance, and is so simple that, like all other great discoveries, it causes all to wonder that it was so long coming. Unlike many great discoveries, it was not an accidental hit, but rather the fruit of inductive reasoning and much experiment. It is said that Professor Jacques already has refused $600,000 for a six-tenths interest in the patent right.

The Roman Catholic Church in Politics.

The breach between the English Liberals and the Irish members of Parliament has widened during the past week, as a result of the vote on the second reading of the Education Bill, the Irish voting, as it had been predicted they would do, solidly for the law calculated to strengthen the grip of the Anglican and Roman Catholic clergy upon the educational machinery of Great Britain. Of course, such desertion of allies without whom it is futile to hope for anything approaching Irish home rule has opened the eyes of many Liberals who followed Mr. Gladstone against their better judgment, and it is thought that before long the rank and file of the Liberal party will make it clear that leaders are wanted now who will rally them with a policy in which home rule for Ireland is either omitted or made a non-essential as a test of party fealty. The attitude of our Congregational brethren across the water toward the Education Bill, which Parliament is now discussing, may be inferred from the following resolution passed unanimously at a recent meeting of the London Congregational Union, and a cable message reports that they have gone even further now in their repudiation of their former Irish allies:

This assembly of the London Congregational Union, consisting of ministers and delegates of London Congregational churches, while approving of the proposal to raise the school age from eleven to twelve years, feels compelled to vigorously oppose the Education Bill now before Parliament, seeing that the effect will be: (a) To constitute an authority which will neither be elected solely for the purpose of education nor wholly representative in its character. (b) To cripple and finally extinguish the School Board system, which has achieved splendid educational and moral results. (c) To further endow denominational schools with public funds without granting public control. (d) To introduce into local public life sectarian bitterness and animosity. This assembly considers that in dealing with education no favor should be shown to denominational schools over Board schools, and that all grants of public money shall be accompanied by an efficient public local control.

In Canada the attempt of the Roman Catholic Church to dragoon its followers into support of the Conservative candidates, because they are friends of remedial legislation for Manitoba and pledged to grant it, has developed a peculiar state of affairs, the hierarchy of Ontario, New Brunswick, Nova Scotia, Prince Edward Island and British Columbia declining to join with the hierarchy of Quebec in a collective mandament which the clergy of the latter diocese read from their pulpits last Sunday, ordering Roman Catholic voters "as a duty of conscience" to give their votes for candidates disposed to vote for the remedial bill.

Russia's Gains.

The incident at Chee-Foo, China, whereby Russia secures from China title to property hitherto vested in an English commercial firm, has been considered significant enough by the British and German ministers to warrant them in filing a protest, and Great Britain has served notice on China that she will be held responsible for any action hostile to British interests. Unfortunately this protest comes too late. Russia's grip is too secure to be wrested away now by a mere British bluff or threat. Li Hung Chang has been at St. Petersburg for several weeks, and he has the freest access to the Russian Foreign Office. Treaties are being cemented. Russian authority is supreme at Peking, nor is it lacking in influence at Tokio, if the latest news from Japan is authentic, namely, that Russia and Japan have come to an amicable agreement respecting the future of Korea. From Moscow come descriptions of unprecedented splendor of decoration, unbounded hospitality to tributary princes and journalists, and truly royal preparations for the coronation of the new czar and czarina.

NOTES.

Ohio, New York and Rhode Island now compel railroads to carry bicycles free as baggage.

The General Assembly of the Presbyterian Church in New South Wales will petition the colonial legislature to make it possible for the Gothenburg or Norwegian company license system to be tried in the colony as a method of reforming the traffic in liquor.

The Citizens' League of New Orleans has brought about a compromise of the contest between the rival claimants for the governorship of Louisiana, whereby Foster takes the office and will hold it, but he in turn pledges the Democratic party to pass an Australian ballot law, to call a constitutional convention and order a new election of State officials.

The prompt payment of claims by China to individuals and societies who suffered by the anti-Christian riots last year (the last of the American claims having just been paid, see Progress of the Kingdom) is in marked contrast to the deliberation with which Turkey is settling the claims upon her; and, indeed, it puts to shame the record of some civilized nations.

The Berlin Post has obtained and published the text of a telegram sent by Emperor William last February, when the rupture between Dr. Stoecker, leader of the Christian Socialists, and the Conservatives was beginning. It will be seen that the emperor agrees with other political bosses as to the proper sphere of activity for Christian clergymen. He said:

Stoecker has finished as I foretold years ago. Political clergymen are monstrosities. Whoever is a Christian is also social. This Christian Socialist nonsense leads to self-conceit and intolerance and is directly contrary to Christianity. Clergymen should mind the souls of the community and not mix in politics.

Secretary of State Olney is authority for the statement that "France is treating Madagascar as a French colony acquired by contest, that the native government is no longer in existence, and that the treaties concluded by it are as void." France holds that the treaty of 1881 between the United States and Madagascar is abrogated, and that our dealings with inhabitants of Madagascar hereafter must be in accord with the conventions in force between the United States and France. Hence she asks for a discontinuance of our consular courts. Letters from the representatives of the London Missionary Society in Madagascar report far better treatment for themselves and the Protestant natives than they had expected from the French rulers, which is an encouraging fact.

One of the expert watch-makers sent from Illinois to Japan to assist the Osaka Watch Company in starting its plant says of the Japanese workmen whom he had to teach:

They are fine imitators, but they are not worth much as mechanics. In the factory I had under me the best skilled labor in Japan. Some of the workmen there can take an awl or a sharp piece of wire and can carve and bore a stick into the most fanciful shapes, but when it comes to fine work in mechanics they are not of much value. They are not exact enough and do not appreciate the value of care in their work. They do not have and do not seem able to develop that fine mechanical discrimination so characteristic of good workmen.

Our minister to Japan, Mr. Dunn, just arrived in this country on a furlough, discounts many of the alarmist cries respecting Japanese competition.

Spain has formally protested against the frequency with which filibustering expeditions leave our shores and the failure of our courts to convict when those engaged in such expeditions are captured. No wonder! Officials in Washington may be sincere in their intention to live up to treaty obligations, but minor officials are not. The London Times correspondent gives the gloomiest account of the condition of affairs in Spain. He sees no possibility of Spain winning the contest. Senator Morgan has induced the Senate to pass a resolution calling for an investigation of American citizens' rights in Cuba, and asking Secretary Olney and President Cleveland for copies of all correspondence between Spain and the United States bearing on the treaty of 1877, which Caleb Cushing negotiated and signed.

IN BRIEF.

Are you awake to the glory of the opening summer—to the beauty with which God reclothes for us the face of the world in which we live?

We print elsewhere, in advance, the report of the Board of Ministerial Aid, which will be read to the General Association next week. It hints at much more than it can tell. This agency should receive the warm support of all Congregationalists.

We have heard it said in explanation of the ease with which the Lowell Church Bill and the Short Lobster Bill were passed by the Massachusetts General Court that it was a case of logrolling—Lowell and lobsters. If so the combination collapsed quickly enough in the face of the governor's vetoes.

"If you will play baseball on Sunday when away from home, you cannot have us for spectators on week days when at home" is the message of Springfield (Mass ) Christians to the local club. At a mass meeting, held in the First Church Sunday night, 1,500 indignant citizens announced the boycott—novel but justified.

Among the apt sayings that have been going the rounds lately is one which the enthusiastic welcome given to the American athletes returned from Greece makes worth quoting:

> The Athens athlete sadly mused
> O'er contests he had lost on;
> Said he, "It's bad when Greek meets Greek,
> But worse when Greek meets Boston."

The surmise of our London correspondent that a comparatively unknown, earnest evangelical worker would be chosen to succeed Mr. Hurnhall at Westminster Chapel is proved correct by the selection of Rev. Richard Westrope, formerly of Leeds, who has accepted the pastorate. It was Westminster Chapel, it will be remembered, that strove so hard to lure Dr. Bradford from his Montclair pastorate.

Salem lost "a good physician" last week, when Dr. Amos Johnson died. If it be true, as the Boston Transcript recently asserted, that the physician is superseding the clergyman in his intimacy with and knowledge of families, then a readjustment of social relations is going on which must be reckoned with by the church—a readjustment, too, making more and more important the union of Christian character with professional skill, so beautifully illustrated in Dr. Johnson's life.

Bishop Coxe of western New York is courageous as well as belligerent, and when, last week, he heard a ritualistic Elmira rector telling the attendants at the convention of the Brotherhood of St. Andrew that they should seek priestly absolution from sins, he instantly publicly rebuked the callow youth, saying: "A man who wants to hear confessions is not fit to hear them. . . . Priests who cannot teach the truth as the church has received it should leave the communion."

Last spring a leading surgeon of New York city was summoned to Princeton to save, if he could, the life of a student shot in a fracas. He journeyed thither on a special train furnished by the Pennsylvania Railroad. Waiting some time for a bill for the train the surgeon wrote asking for a statement of his indebtedness. The officials replied that no charge was made, as the service rendered was "in the interest of suffering humanity." This corporation has a soul. It also—and perhaps consequently—pays dividends and stands well with European investors.

The remains of Charles Carleton Coffin, which have been resting in the receiving vault at Brookline with the expectation that they would be buried in the spring at his old home in Boscawen, N. H., were interred last Thursday in Mount Auburn. There was a general desire on the part of the people in Boston, led by the John A. Andrew Post, G. A. R., that the famous war correspondent and author should be buried near the city, which for so many years has been his home, and in our American Westminster Abbey, where so many noted men repose. The burial services were simple and impressive, conducted by his pastor, Rev. W. E. Barton, D. D., of the Shawmut Church.

It is to be regretted that at the annual meeting of the Scottish Congregational Union, just held in Glasgow, union with the Evangelical Union was not consummated. A Presbyterian present described the meeting as an eye-opener to him—"accustomed to cast-iron rules and formulæ"—for its simplicity and freedom of conduct. After a battle royal between the friends and foes of union, the former won on a test vote of 144 to 33, but a lay leader of the opposition instantly served notice that "the twelve churches represented in the minority will claim to be the Congregational Union of Scotland, claiming its whole assets and estate, powers and privileges, the majority having now seceded."

A supply committee spent last Sunday in a city not a hundred miles from Boston, and, after hearing a stimulating sermon from the minister, whom they had been sent to judge, weigh and appraise, were nearly confounded when he gave out the hymn whose second stanza reads:

> Let strangers walk around
> The city where we dwell,
> Compass and view thy holy ground
> And mark the building well;
> The order of thy house,
> The worship of thy court,
> The cheerful songs, the solemn vows,
> And make a fair report.

The minister is to be acquitted of all thought of a special application of the verse, but the members of the committee have gained an entirely new conception of the range and uses of Christian hymnology.

Much rumor is current about Ian Maclaren and the Broadway Tabernacle. Mr. Cornelius N. Bliss of the board of trustees denies that any call has been sent to the great Scotch delineator of life. Much nonsense is current, also, notably the remark credited to a member of the Tabernacle: "The only salvation of the parish lies in summoning another great Scotch preacher to the pulpit." We gladly recognize the acquisitions to the American pulpit through foreign importation, but we are not prepared thus to minimize native talent. The New York World cabled to Ian Maclaren last week and asked him whether e would accept a call. He replied: "You uggest a great honor, of which I know noth-ng. The question of settling in America has ever been before my mind in any shape."

President Whitsitt of the Louisville South-rn Baptist Seminary, in defending himself gainst the attacks of his critics in the contro-ersy over the method of baptism among the rly English Baptists, referred to in our col-mns last week, goes out of his way to attack ie originality and courtesy of Dr. Dexter in s researches and publications on the same opic. In this week's Examiner Dr. Henry S. urrage points out that the articles by Dr. Whitsitt, which he complains were ignored r Dr. Dexter, were published as editorials in ie Independent, and therefore anonymously, o that Dr. Dexter did not know their author's ame, and that Dr. Dexter was already busy ith the subject, as is proved by articles in he Congregationalist antedating Dr. Whit-tt's publication. Among those who knew im Dr. Dexter needed no such vindication.

The Watchman says in relation to the mod-rn American newspaper: "It is by no means ue that the entire body of the American eople have gone after the gods of childish-ess, sensationalism and pruriency. A paper lited for servants of the lower class, for porting men and men about town, cannot, in ie nature of the case, interest persons of ducation and refinement." This is true, but ie peril is that parents of this type will be-ome careless in admitting papers of this sort o their homes, forgetting that their children re only potentially "persons of education nd refinement." "A part of the circulation f the sensational press," The Watchman adds, is due to the sheer negligence of parents who do not stop to ask whether this or that aper is suitable reading for their sons and aughters."

One of the latest acquisitions to the pastoral orces in this vicinity has yielded to the pre-ailing drift hereabouts and appears now efore his people on Sunday in a robe. No ne was so startled by the innovation as his wn children who, in the section of the ountry from which they recently came, had vidently not been accustomed to seeing either heir father or other ministers thus arrayed. The two youngsters came forward last Sunday orning after the service in a highly excited ondition, and pressed their way through the roup that had gathered to salute the pastor. The boy was heard to remark to his sister as hey passed, "Look what papa's got on!" nd a moment later was heard asking his arent, "Papa, what have you got that wrapper n for?" Doubtless in the privacy of the ome a full explanation will be forthcoming, neanwhile we may free ourselves from anxiety s to the harm to result from any liturgical endencies at work in our denomination, so ong as the rising generation cherishes such ow church views of the purpose and value f clerical garments.

There must be many who, whether or not hey have already given money for the relief f the suffering Armenians, can, and gladly vill, spare clothing for the refugees who are pouring into Smyrna and other seaports. Rev. Lyman Bartlett, for thirty years a mis-ionary of the American Board in Smyrna nd now home on a furlough, is collecting garments and forwarding them to fellow-missionaries at that point who will place hem to the best advantage. Here is an xcellent way of bringing to bear temporal ssistance where it is urgently needed and without any fear that the relief sent will be delayed in its transmission. We bespeak a prompt and generous response to this appeal. Packages should be directed to Rev. Lyman Bartlett, care of the shipping department of he American Board, 1 Somerset Street. Al-most any kind of clothing which is still wear-able will be welcome, inasmuch as there is a great horde of applicants and the demand is sure to continue not only through the sum-mer months but well on into next autumn and winter.

STAFF CORRESPONDENCE.

FROM NEW YORK.

A Notable Occasion.

A truly notable gathering was the "reception" given at Sherry's on Tuesday evening to Rev. Dr. and Mrs. Henry A. Stimson. The invitations were issued by the city's best known clergymen of all evangelical denominations and business men most prominent in financial, social and religious circles in New York and Brooklyn. So, too, were the invited. Dr. Storrs opened the speaking with an address even more laudatory than was his voicing of the result of council given in The Congregationalist. No man could desire a more generous indorsement of his character and work, and surely no other living man could embody unstinted commendation in words more felicitously chosen. Dr. Storrs was followed by Dr. John Hall and President Low, and Dr. Stimson fitly responded. Fine vocal and instrumental music enlivened the occasion.

And Another.

By a meeting full of historic interest the Collegiate (Dutch) Church, on the eleventh, celebrated the 200th anniversary of the giving of its charter, May 11, 1696. The services were held in the church at Fifth Avenue and Forty eighth Street, Rev. Dr. E. B. Coe, pastor, who delivered the historical address. The music was of the highest order, including Luther's Ein Feste Burg, and the hymns, "Glorious things of thee are spoken," sung to a Dutch air of the sixteenth century, and "O God our help," to the Holland national air. Though Dutch in its origin and naturally somewhat tenacious of its traditions—its life here having begun long before the getting of its charter, as early as 1628—the Collegiate Church has in it no little of the vigor of youth and of late fairly keeps pace with the religious life of the times. Its wealth, reaching probably $5,000,000, is equaled only by that of Trinity (Episcopal) Corporation.

A Happy Reunion.

The Manhattan Conference on Thursday of this week, held in the Tompkins Avenue Church, was made an occasion of general rejoicing by the reunion, after twenty years' separation, of the Congregational churches belonging to the Manhattan Conference and the New York and Brooklyn Association. The latter is really a conference, churches as well as ministers constituting its membership. Twenty years of time and several deaths have wrought such changes in the circumstances which led to the separation that there remained little valid reason for its continuance, and many in both bodies have for some years been seeking their reunion. Committees of the two bodies arranged for it on terms satisfactory to both, and it was accomplished in the simplest possible way. After the formal opening of the Manhattan's afternoon session, the other body, headed by its chairman, Rev. D. Butler Pratt, with Dr. Abbott, escorted by Drs. Behrends and Lyman, filed into the aisle and answered to the roll-call. Kindly greetings were tendered to the new comers by Dr. Meredith, emphasized with hearty applause by the audience, and henceforth "bygones are to be bygones," and the Congregational churches of New York and Brooklyn are to live and work together under the new name, Manhattan-Brooklyn Conference of Congregational Churches. Of the new conference Dr. A. C. Perkins was chosen president for a year, and Rev. J. Brittan Clark secretary and treasurer. The evening session was given to addresses from Drs. McLeod, Abbott, Virgin and Storrs on the Relation of Congregationalism to the Evangelization of Large Cities.

Those Blessed Women.

Our college women are happy, and well they may be. Barnard College's trustees bought for $160,000 ground for two buildings near the new site of Columbia, leaving $100,000 on mortgage. They had raised $52,000 of it when an unknown friend offered $100,000 to Barnard, provided the mortgage was canceled by others not later than May 10. In these times, and after all the hard work laid out already, it seemed impossible to meet the conditions even of so munificent a gift. But on Friday, 8th, up comes that princely giver, Mr. John D. Rockefeller, with $25,000 on condition that the other $23,000 be raised by Saturday midnight. In one day's work, such as only love of a good cause inspires, Treasurer George A. Plimpton and a band of Barnard's alumnæ and friends with joy brought in the mortgage money. And now it appears that the conditional $100,000 is the gift of an up the Hudson lady, who thus honors the memory of her husband and her father.

The alumnæ of the university law school gave a dinner at Delmonico's the other day, at which the presidents of Vassar, Wellesley, Rochester and Bryn Mawr, with Chancellor McCracken, Mr. Depew and several others, talked of the "old times," less than forty years ago, when there was no college education for women, in contrast with this year of grace when women's colleges have more than 16,000 students, yet turn away hundreds of applicants for want of room.

Wheel Christians.

Brooklyn does not mean to be often behind the procession either in religious or secular enterprise. Its city mission society last summer kept in active service on Sundays four gospel wagons, from which more than 20,000 people were addressed, many of them Sunday bicyclers. This summer it is proposed to add to the force, the $350 expense for each wagon to come chiefly from Sunday schools, and to make a specialty of reaching bicyclers at their favorite resorts.

But the Episcopal Church Club is planning what they regard as more churchly and more permanent—a "wheelmen's church," at one of the popular bicycle seaside headquarters, where the "wheels" can be safely guarded while the wheelers are spiritually fed. It looks as though bicycling were coming to be reckoned as one of the Christian duties.

The New England Church, Brooklyn East, is rejoicing over the prospect of soon filling the pastoral vacancy caused by Rev. Alexander Lewis's going to Worcester. It has unanimously invited to its pulpit Rev. W. T. McElveen, Ph. D., the organizer, and for six years pastor, of the North Church of this city. Dr. McElveen is a Yale graduate, has seen a wide variety of religious service, has done good work as a "newspaper man," and among the outside classes, as well as in the pulpit, Sunday schools and parish homes. It it understood that he will accept the New England's call.

IV. The Heidelberg Catechism.

By Prof. Williston Walker, D. D.

The Reformation was far more than an age of doctrinal renovation, it was a period of spiritual quickening; and this revival of the Christian life was confined to no section of the church. The Catholic body, which withstood most of the doctrinal alterations that the reformers introduced, was scarcely less profoundly stirred spiritually than the new Protestant churches which went out from it. Nowhere was that new impulse more manifest than in increased zeal for the instruction of the ignorant and the young—an instruction which took the form of catechetical training to such a degree that, though this method of spiritual education has its illustrations in other ages of the church, the Reformation period is the great catechism producing era of ecclesiastical history. Many of the leading reformers, Luther, Calvin, Œcolampadius, Cranmer, Bullinger and numbers of their humbler associates and followers, as well as Roman champions like Canisius and Bellarmine, produced such epitomes of Christian instruction; but four may be distinguished as of special importance: the Short Catechism of Luther of 1529, the Roman Catechism of 1566 (designed, however, for priests rather than for people), that of Heidelberg of 1563, and the Westminster Shorter Catechism of 1647. Of these none has attained a higher authority or a more extended use than the Heidelberg Catechism.

It was the misfortune of the Protestant movement that it early divided into two opposing camps—the Lutheran and the so-called Reformed—the one coming into being through the activity of the Saxon reformers, Luther and Melanchthon; the other bearing the impress of the theologians of Switzerland, Zwingli and Calvin. While these two schools were essentially one in their conception of the method of salvation and in their rejection of Roman peculiarities, they differed regarding the proportion of the forms of the old Catholic worship to be retained under the limitation of the principle of the supreme authority of the Scriptures which both recognized, they were unlike in the strenuousness of their church discipline, they held opposite views as to whether baptism was a regenerative rite, they came, after the death of the Augustinian Luther, to dissimilar conceptions of the share of the human will in conversion; but their chief point of opposition, openly recognized as divisive from the debate at Marburg in 1529, was as to the nature of Christ's presence in the Supper. On this point Luther stoutly maintained the conception of a corporeal presence of the Saviour in connection with the sacred elements, so that all who partook of the sacrament, whether believing or unbelieving, received Christ; while the Reformed, after holding with Zwingli that the Supper is simply a commemoration in which the believer's faith is spiritually quickened, came, under the influence of Calvin, to the position that it includes a real reception by the believer through faith of the life-giving power of the glorified humanity of our Lord.

These distinctions may seem relatively unimportant to the present age. It may appear strange enough that men who were substantially agreed as to almost all other Christian doctrines and who were at one on all points respecting the Lord's Supper itself, except that one question of the nature of Christ's presence therein on which the Scriptures have so little to say, should refuse the hand of Christian brotherhood as Luther did to Zwingli in 1529. But they were not unimportant distinctions in the eyes of the men of the sixteenth century. For this reason the Lutherans at the Augsburg Diet of 1530 took special pains not to be confused with the Swiss Protestants. The same cause led the Lutheran cities to refuse shelter to the Dutch refugees whom the Catholic government of Mary drove out of England. And when Melanchthon and a portion of the Germans came to tolerate the sacramental views of Calvin side by side with those of Luther, and even to prefer them, the result was division and mutual persecution in the Lutheran ranks, so that, instead of presenting a united front to the reviving power of Catholicism, the parties of the German reformation entered on that period of estrangement which was nearly to cost Protestantism its life in the Thirty Years' War. It was in the heat of the early part of this controversy that the Heidelberg Catechism was born.

The Palatinate, from whose capital, Heidelberg, the catechism takes its name, was the native country of Melanchthon, who had been a student at its university, and when the Reformation was brought into this Rhenish electorate, after Luther's death, it was largely molded by Melanchthon's advice. From the first the general type of theology inclined to the moderate sacramentarian views of Melanchthon's later life, while the influence of the Swiss reformation was so strong that a Calvinistic simplicity characterized public worship. Yet in no German land did Protestant conflicts regarding the Supper become more scandalous. The worthy elector, Frederick III., found, on his accession in 1559, that he must decide between the warring parties and he earnestly supported that view of Christ's presence in which Calvin and Melanchthon substantially agreed. By this conscientious action he was placed in a most difficult position, being the first German ruler to adopt any other creed than that of the unaltered Augsburg Confession of 1530, whose adherents alone shared legal rights with the Catholics under the Peace of 1555, which was the religious constitution of Germany; and for this profession of his faith he had to suffer attack from Protestants and Catholics alike. This was the prince who, in 1560 and 1561, called two young men to his assistance, one Caspar Olewig (or Olevianus, in the classical transformation of name often practiced by sixteenth century scholars), as court preacher and ecclesiastical adviser, and the other Zacharias Bär (or Ursinus), as professor of theology in the University of Heidelberg.

The Reformation was an era of young men. Though Luther was nearly thirty-four when he nailed the theses to the door of the Wittenberg church, Charles V. was only twenty one when he became a lifelong opponent of the Reformation at the Diet of Worms. Melanchthon was twenty-four when his Loci Communes brought him general recognition as the systematizer of Lutheran theology. At twenty-six Calvin had written the Institutes, which rank him as the foremost theologian of the Reformation period. Wallis, at thirty-one, gave their admirably logical form to the answers of the Westminster Shorter Catechism. And Ursinus was twenty-eight, while Olevianus was two years younger, when they wrote the Heidelberg Catechism in 1562.

But though the elector's two theological advisers were thus young in years, each had received a training of unusual breadth and thoroughness, and each had obtained a wide personal acquaintance with the leaders of the Reformation. The spiritually-minded, shy and learned Ursinus was by birth from Breslau in eastern Germany, and had been for seven years a favorite pupil of Melanchthon; but he was almost as warmly befriended by Bullinger, Calvin, and Beza on the journey to Switzerland in 1557-8 which determined his own mind in favor of the Calvinistic theology. The eloquent and executively gifted Olevianus was a west German of Trier, and had received the training of the best universities of France, as well as of the Swiss reformers under whom Ursinus had also studied. There was nothing provincial or immature in the education of these two theologians of the Reformed faith to whom the elector committed the preparation of a manual for the religious instruction of his people.

The catechism was the result of a careful combination of their separate drafts by Ursinus and Olevianus—a combination to which Ursinus contributed the theological acumen which marks the entire document, while to Olevianus is due its warm and eloquent expression of Christian feeling. Yet neither of the authors ignored the work of their great predecessors among the catechists of the century, and they drew suggestions in particular of the catechisms of Calvin, Bullinger, and John à Lasco. By December, 1562, the work had received the elector's sanction, and after being approved by an assembly of the ministers and teachers of the Palatinate during the closing days of the year, it was put forth, early in 1563, for use throughout the elector's dominions. Though much discussed and opposed by reason of its Calvinism, the catechism found immediate and wide acceptance not merely as a basis of Christian instruction, but as a standard of doctrine. Within a few years its intrinsic excellence led to its adoption by all the Calvinistic churches of Germany, and a portion of those of Switzerland. It soon spread to Poland and Hungary, and it found no little use in Scotland till supplanted by later catechisms, notably by those of the Westminster Assembly. But its warmest welcome was in Holland, where it acquired authoritative recognition by 1588, and where it was further approved by the Synod of Dort in 1619. By the Calvinists of Dutch and German spiritual lineage the Heidelberg Catechism was transplanted to America, where it forms today the only doctrinal standard of the Reformed (German) Church, and is one of the symbols to which every minister of the formed (Dutch) Church is required to bscribe. Indeed its official recognition, not its general use, has been much exnded in the United States as recently as 70, when it was approved by the Presbyian General Assembly. No Reformation nfession, save that of Augsburg, is more nored, and none is still more widely used. The Heidelberg Catechism was modeled a general way on the sequence of thought Paul's epistle to the Romans. It falls to the three divisions—"Of Man's Mis-y"; "Of Man's Redemption," where not ly the need of an atonement and the na-re of faith is taught, but the Apostles' eed is elaborately expounded as containg the sum of necessary Christian belief, d the sacraments as confirmatory of faith; d "Of Thankfulness," where the Ten mmandments are explained as the sumary of the law of God, obedience to which the ideal of the Christian life, and the rd's Prayer as the model for all those ts of prayer by which the Christian akes known his wants and his thanksgivg to God.

Yet it is not this admirable order in the velopment of its thought that has given chief attractiveness to the Heidelberg techism. It is, rather, the remarkable mbination of precision of statement with rvor of Christian feeling. The first ques-on and answer, like those of the Westmin-er Shorter Catechism, are the most famil-r, and they illustrate this quality of the erman symbol in high degree:

What is thy only comfort in life and in ath?

That I, with body and soul, both in life and death, am not my own, but belong to my ithful Saviour Jesus Christ, who with his ecious blood has fully satisfied for all my ns, and redeemed me from all the power of e devil; and so preserves me that without e will of my Father in heaven not a hair n fall from my head; yea, that all things ust work together for my salvation. Where-re, by his Holy Spirit, he also assures me of ernal life, and makes me heartily willing d ready henceforth to live unto him.

ut others are no less felicitous. The thir-second is an example:

Why art thou called a Christian?

Because by faith I am a member of Christ, nd thus a partaker of his anointing; in or-er that I also may confess his name, may resent myself a living sacrifice of thankful-ss to him, and may with free conscience ght against sin and the devil in this life, and reafter, in eternity, reign with him over all reatures.

The definition of faith (No. 21), though nplying, like most of the statements of he Reformers, a more positive element of ssurance than would now generally be ecognized, is probably unsurpassed in killfulness of statement:

What is true faith?

It is not only a certain knowledge whereby hold for truth all that God has revealed to us n his Word, but also a hearty trust which he Holy Ghost works in me by the Gospel, hat not only to others, but to me also, foriveness of sins, everlasting righteousness nd salvation, are freely given by God, merely f grace, only for the sake of Christ's merits.

The moderation of the Catechism is carcely less conspicuous than its felicity f expression. Though decidedly Calvinstic on the debated questions of predestiation, baptism, the Lord's Supper and picures in churches, it is not polemic. There s one interesting exception. The eightieth nswer, in the accepted form, declares the nass to be "an accursed idolatry." Now, owever consonant with the general feeling f the Reformation epoch this accusation nay be, it is wholly foreign to the tone of he catechism as a whole; and it is not surprising to learn that it constitutes no part of the original edition prepared by Ursinus and Olevianus, but was added at the command of the elector himself in later editions of 1563. Doubtless the elector was moved to this warlike insertion by the nine stringent anathemas of the Protestant position regarding the Supper which had just been issued by the Catholic Council of Trent; but this princely bit of creed-making was a blemish rather than an adornment.

Yet it is probable that the very qualities which give the greatest value and charm to the Heidelberg Catechism, and which most commend it to the German mind, are those which would make an Englishman or an American shrink a little from using it as it was intended to be employed. The Anglo-Saxon does not naturally express his deepest feelings, the German takes comfort in their utterance. And the devotion, the warmth, the intensity and depth of the religious experience which the Heidelberg Catechism expresses is too profound for the Anglo-Saxon readily to make a matter of public recitation; while he shrinks more than the German or the Dutchman from using statements so strongly presumptive of personal religious experience in the instruction of those whose Christian life is as yet slightly developed. But, however a Congregationalist of Anglo-Saxon antecedents may hesitate about the advisability of employing so warmly devotional a catechism in the teaching of the young—to say nothing of a few doctrinal archaisms which are to be found in its answers—he can have no question as to its value to the Christian of mature experience, nor can he fail to hold the Heidelberg Catechism in honor as the most perfect illustration that the Reformation produced of the possible union of full and logical doctrinal statement with ardent Christian feeling so that the creed makes its appeal as much to the Christian affections as to the intellect.

REV. NEHEMIAH BOYNTON, D. D.

BY H. A. B.

There is nothing conventionally clerical about the ex-pastor of the Union Church, Boston, and the new pastor of the First Church, Detroit. You always think of Boynton the man before you do of Boynton the minister. Indeed the virility and buoyancy of the man are what give power to his ministry. He would have been a success in any calling for which he had a spark of aptitude, and when he came to the point where the ways diverge in a young man's life more than one inviting path that might have led on to commercial achievement opened before him. He chose a profession in which considerations of self-advancement yield to the claims of duty and which to every true-hearted man must have in it always the element of sacrifice.

Those who knew Boynton as a rollicking Amherst student, seldom guilty of consuming the midnight oil in the pursuit of learning, were a bit surprised when the popular collegian joined the little group of his classmates who set their faces toward Andover Hill. And even when the course of special preparation for the ministry had been begun, there might have been some who would never have surmised that the healthy, hearty theologue, who liked to take a trip every now and then to Boston and to Wellesley, would one day become a successor to the venerated and venerable Nehemiah Adams and an honored leader in the denomination.

But there came a day when, not through any startling visitation, but through the normal deepening and ripening of a nature never irresponsive to higher ideals, never forgetful of the honest New England blood that flowed in his veins, when life presented itself to Boynton in new and larger aspects, when he felt what the older biographers would have termed "a call," when the yearning grew strong within him to prove himself conspicuously worthy of his lineage and to throw the full weight of his manhood into the ministry opening before him. He had been a "splendid fellow" before this—he always had been one. He had won honors here and there. He was known as a bright, attractive, energetic man, but from that time on he had found, what every one needs to find before he reaches his best estate, a central motive and a ruling ideal. He would be a minister, whatever a few here or there might think, and with God's blessing he would be a good and a successful minister.

The clarified ambition, the compressing of his energies into a single channel, did not throw the man into the shadow. With his temperament and his abounding physical life he could not play the ascetic, and he has never tried to. His is a breezy, out-of-doors disposition. He loves to fish, to sail a boat, to camp beneath the stars. He has the sailor's fondness for the salt and shimmer of the sea, the woodsman's delight in the odors of the pine forest, the sportsman's satisfaction in a good catch of trout. God has made the world beautiful for him, and every innocent amusement and recreation he thinks it right to lay hold of and thence to extract that which will invigorate and broaden the life of man.

His pulpit occupies the central place in Dr. Boynton's conception of his ministry. Gifted with exceptional facility and fluency of speech and with an uncommon amount of personal magnetism, and not neglecting the benefits accruing from a knowledge of and a deference to accepted homiletical canons, he has steadily grown in his pulpit work from the time when, nearly fifteen years ago, he began preaching to a congregation of farmers in Littleton, Mass. First of all, he knows how to handle himself. When he stands before a congregation he has all his resources at command. He early trained himself to dispense with notes, and with no wooden or paper barrier between himself and his listeners he delivers his message with entire self-possession. He possesses, also, the orator's instinct that seizes upon the best avenues of approach to his hearers. It seldom takes more than the initial sentence for Dr. Boynton to arrest the attention of his audience. The sparkling anecdote, the bright epigram, the forceful metaphor, the unhackneyed simile, the suggestive quotation, are effective weapons in his hands, and the ease and at times the opulence of his style charm and uplift the hearer. He is fond—possibly too fond—of alliteration, and many of his discourses are so subdivided that the three or four points can be easily remembered, because they begin with the same letter.

The fact that his sermons are so admirably expressed does not mean poverty of thought or a lack of invigorating mental and spiritual food. They show him to be a man of wide reading and abreast of modern thought in many of the lines along which it is advancing. His library is a large, choice and varied one. Poetry and essays, histories and commentaries, solid works on theology, and the latest and the best fiction crowd his study table, and there are few ministers so careful as he to keep their morning hours inviolate for study and reading. He uses note-books freely and reads with all his homiletic faculties on the alert for that which may enable him to adorn or enforce the truth which he tries to bring home to the hearts and consciences of men.

This faithful and varied preparation always tells in his pulpit and platform work. In constant demand as he is for occasional sermons, missionary addresses and after dinner speeches, he reserves for the pulpit his choicest material; for there is nothing he likes better than to preach the gospel of Christ. He was never more in his element than when, during his Haverhill pastorate, he used on Sunday evenings to take possession of the City Hall, advertise widely the popular services and with all the vigor and enthusiasm of his nature proclaim to the great congregation of working people the richness, beauty and the glory of the Christian life. He is the kind of man who every year, for a few weeks at least, ought to preach in a theater or public hall or some place of resort to which people can be attracted who will not enter a house set apart solely for Christian worship.

Yet Dr. Boynton is widely useful in other spheres than that of the pulpit. In his most genial after dinner moods he likes to draw forth from the depths of his capacious "storied urn" the little tale that relates to one of his own sturdy scions who came home from school weeping because a mate had been twitting him with the fact that while his own father was an insurance man young Boynton's was nothing but "a darned old minister." The youth who thus annoyed his schoolfellow was not aware of the multitudinous services rendered by Dr. Boynton to the denomination and the public at large. A member of the Prudential Committee of the American Board and of the executive committee of the American Missionary Association, he has for the last few years taken a responsible and influential part in the important deliberations of those great societies. Calls to serve, in one way or another, the churches with which he is affiliated, the town or city in which his lot may be cast, and the friends of whom he has legions, are many and frequent, and to but an infinitesimal portion does he turn a deaf ear.

Those who know him do not need to be told that he is an intense Congregationalist, and that his sympathies with other denominations are not narrowed thereby. He believes in the polity in which he was bred and he is fearless enough to criticise its weaknesses, but always in the best of temper and always with a view to increasing its efficiency. That he will, in his new field, prove not merely a trusted and successful leader of his people, but a tower of strength to our denomination in the middle West, is as foregone a conclusion as almost anything in this world of chance and change can be. A royal man, an enthusiastic Christian, a devoted servant of his Master, he will do good and increasingly valuable work wherever stationed. Many hearts will follow his career with love and interest, and none more fondly than some of us who have come to know what manner of man he is through intimate comradeship on land and sea, in the mutual enjoyment of old world scenes and satisfactions and in the sober, patient toil of strenuous working days.

IN LOVING MEMORY.

REV. E. K. ALDEN, D. D.

BY MRS. L. A. H. BUTLER.

In the calm stillness of the first May Sabbath
We drew around the cross,
The burden of a sorrow fresh upon us,
A new-felt sense of loss.
And while the sacramental bread was broken,
The wine in memory poured,
We thought of him who that day in his kingdom
Drank new wine with the Lord.

Above us, as in loving benediction,
We saw his pictured face,
And seemed to hear again, in gentlest accents,
His tender words of grace,
As with wet eyes he told the wondrous story
Of Christ's redemptive love,
Or bore our spirits, as on eagle's pinions,
Up to its source above.

Was it not meet a life so pure and gentle
Should pass so sweet away—
To know no hour of weary, wasting sickness,
No touch of mind's decay?
But calm as babe upon its mother's bosom
To close his loving eyes,
Then know the meaning of his Master's promise,
"With me in Paradise."

Who can conceive the bliss of his awaking
In that fair land of light,
As one by one the glories that awaited
Unfolded to his sight.
Souls he had guided there by prayer and labor,
Long parted friends to embrace,
But over all, the glory far excelling,
To see his Saviour's face.

It was enough for him whose faithful footsteps
Earth's path of service trod,
Whose single eye and earnest heart bore record
Of quiet walk with God.
Through the long years upon his Father's promise
His trusting soul relied,
Till his reward came in the homeward summons,
And he is satisfied.

THE STRUGGLE IN CUBA.

BY REV. E. P. HERRICK, TAMPA.

The Cuban war, so near at hand, engrosses our time and thought. Our great Cuban population sends generous sums to aid the struggling patriots. Tampa and Key West, by reason of their contiguity to the island, are recognized as revolutionary centers. Cuban flags float over the homes of the cigar makers. Here expeditions are planned, mysterious gatherings held, whispered consultations abound. One is reminded of the events of the Civil War. Refugees have been pouring in upon us in great numbers. It is interesting to visit the depot on steamer night, and see the incoming wave of Latin immigration and hear the tales of woe.

We turn from the conflicting and unreliable war news to touch upon some of the moral and religious aspects of the war whose issue will be the liberation of Cuba. Last week Rev. A. J. Diaz stood in our Cuban chapel and gave in his native tongue a thrilling account of his arrest, imprisonment and expulsion from Cuba by direction of the authorities, instigated by the ultramontane priests. His expulsion is a severe blow to the Baptist mission and the evangelical cause.

If the patriots win, Cuba will be opened to evangelical effort. In case of their defeat the present repressive tyrannical régime will continue. If Cuba is added to the galaxy of our States, how important that the leaven of the gospel be placed there! If "Cuba Libre," the prosperity and perpetuity of the new republic under the Southern cross will depend upon the diffusion of intelligence and the ethical and spiritual uplifting of the coming sovereigns. On these gulf shores the Latin and Anglo-Saxon civilizations meet but do not mingle. For the redemption of Cuba let Protestant America labor and pray in unfaltering hope.

CURRENT THOUGHT.

AT HOME.

The New York Observer justly waxes indignant over the attitude, seeming or real, of our responsible officials toward the American citizens resident in Turkey as missionaries. "Alongside of the progress of what is called altruism has marched the doctrine that foreign missions are in some way an interference with the rights of man, that they breed intolerance and interference with individual liberty, that they intrude where they are not wanted and claim a national protection to which they are not entitled. In proportion as the government of the nation has passed from under the control of religious and moral principle and become a political machine, this idea of foreign missions has become dominant; and now the curious spectacle is presented of the great American republic opening its own institutions to the free participation of Roman Catholics and East Indian theosophists, and tolerating every style of missionary from the agnostic and the anarchist to the Chinese idolater, while it fails to protect its own Protestant children in foreign lands, and meekly advises them, after their homes have been desolated, and their converts slain, and their property burned, to retire from the work to which they have been consecrated and abandon positions which they have held in usefulness and honor for half a century. Is this the wish of the American people? Are these the sentiments which will find hearty response from the Christians of America who have given their sons and daughters, their gold and their prayers, to obey the command of their Master: 'Go ye into all the world and preach the gospel to every creature?'"

The Christian Leader believes that "the time was when our city churches, with the true missionary spirit, started and largely sustained churches in the suburbs. The time seems to be coming, if it is not here already, when past favors must be returned in kind. If the suburbs, in these days of electrics, do not show a like missionary spirit and manifest a like generosity as respects the city churches these may become things of the past. Boston no longer lives in Boston. So of New York. So of Philadelphia. The suburb, once the recipient of patronage, is now the stronghold."

ABROAD.

Wilfrid Scawen Blunt, writing from Cairo to the May Nineteenth Century, says: "There is a general feeling that Egypt has been sacrificed to the interests of European politics and that a long farewell will have been said to financial and material reforms." He hopes that Lord Salisbury and the more reasonable section of the cabinet may be satisfied with the thing as a demonstration and, the end of having shown friendliness to Italy having been attained, allow the war (against the Soudanese) quietly to lapse once more into the defensive.

Is it necessary that your mother should die in your arms, that your children should perish in a shipwreck, that you yourself should lie at the point of death, before you will understand that you move and shall move forever in a world of mystery, where the God whom we see not dwells for evermore with his creatures? Why should it be necessary that pain, with fierce lance-thrusts, should awaken the divine memories which lie dormant in our hearts? The wise man does not need these shocks.—M. Materlinck.

NESTS.

I know where meadow grasses rank and high
A cradle cover,
Because two bobolinks with telltale cry
Above them hover.

Some mullein leaves beside my garden wall
Grow unmolested;
And under their pale velvet parasol
Sparrows have nested.

An oriole toiled on from day to day—
The cunning weaver—
Tying her hammock to that leafy spray
Above the river.

No wingless thief can climb that elm's frail stair;
Nor guest unbidden
Can reach the snug, aërial chamber where
Her eggs are hidden.

A marsh wren's cunning hermitage I see,
As my boat passes,
Moored to the green stems of a fleur-de-lis
With strong sea grasses.

And stay! I know another pretty nest
Of braided willow,
With dainty lace and knots of ribbon drest,
And feather pillow.

And just one bird, with moist and downy head,
Herein reposes;
He has no wings—his shoulders grow instead Dimples and roses!

You have a nest and little wingless bird
At your house, maybe;
Of course you know without another word
I mean—a baby!

Let no one infer that the author of One Form of Considerateness in this department would advocate entire silence concerning the friends who have passed into the other life. Such an extreme position, especially in regard to those who have died in the triumphs of Christian faith, would be even worse in its influence than to make the event unduly prominent in family conversе. In this, as in the whole conduct of life, we need to use sanctified common sense. The very fact that little children and some delicately organized adults are in a peculiarly sensitive frame of mind when sorrow invades the home may be taken advantage of, in a tactful way, to lead them into a sweet personal fellowship with Christ. Without harrowing up the feelings, it is possible to touch them, at such times, in a way to inspire instead of to sadden.

The little glimpse which we get in another column of Mrs. Cleveland's life at the White House suggests that in the choice of a presidential candidate this summer the American people would do well to consider the qualities of the wife of the chief executive. In the persons of Mrs. Garfield, Mrs. Hayes, Mrs. Harrison and Mrs. Cleveland, not to mention others who have worthily filled the position, we can see how much the nation is indebted to the influence of their Christian characters. Their attitude toward all moral reforms and all public questions involving ethical points has invariably been on the side of righteousness. It is sometimes said in the settlement of a minister that the parish has no right to expect anything from his wife, the arrangement being solely with him. But is this a sound or wise principle in respect to any man in a prominent position, whose failure or success, and whose place in the hearts of the people, may be greatly modified by the characteristics of his wife? Proud as we all are of Mrs. Cleveland's social graces, we rejoice still more in her Christian virtues, and may her successor fall not a whit below her high level in this particular.

ONE FORM OF CONSIDERATENESS.

BY H. T. E.

It has recently been brought to my notice how much a sensitive person may suffer, when there is a death in the family, simply from hearing it talked about at the table and at all times throughout the day. If it were not for the relief which night brings the strain would sometimes be insupportable. The constant revérting to the one who is gone, calling to mind numberless touching incidents connected with his life or death, reading letters of sympathy, dwelling on the subject of death in general, mourning over words or acts which now are cause for regret, reading at family worship passages which were his favorites, or which are especially appropriate to the sadness of the time, and in many other ways keeping the sorrow fresh in the mind, while it may be a comfort to some is little less than torture to others of more sensitive nature. They may not always be those to whom the blow comes with greatest severity, but who by reason of youth or natural temperament feel everything acutely. To such it is like tearing open a wound which nature is doing her best to heal. Of course, after some time has elapsed, they may be able to speak of these things calmly and without distress, but while the death is a recent event it is too much to expect.

Here let me say a word in general about the habit, common in some families, of discussing painful and perplexing subjects at the table. It may be convenient to take this time when the family are all together, but for many it destroys the comfort of the meal entirely, and from a physiological standpoint it is objectionable. Physicians tell us that while eating we should not give the brain too much to do, nor excite the emotions to a painful degree. Nature cannot attend to so many things at once, and that which is most important for the time being—the proper digestion of our food—is in danger of being neglected. In consequence we lose much of the nourishment to be derived from it. It is always well, if possible, to preserve a cheerful tone to the conversation at table.

But to return—people are differently constituted, and there are many, no doubt, who find comfort, when in bereavement, in dwelling upon their sorrow in such ways as I have mentioned above. It is pleasant to them to be frequently reminded of their departed friends. But, as far as I have observed, it is usually elderly people of whom this is true. Having had repeated blows of this kind, it may be, they naturally receive them more calmly and with less apparent emotion than those to whom such sad events are a new experience. And, aside from this, it is generally true that with the coming on of age the sensibilities become less keen, and less nervous strength is required to control the feelings. A person of seventy or eighty can often hear or relate the most pathetic and affecting incidents perfectly unmoved, while a young person listening to the same will sometimes suffer in the effort to preserve self control. The greater sensitiveness of youth is seldom fully appreciated by elderly people, the diminished keenness of their own feelings leading them to think it something strange and abnormal, whereas, in a sense, each may be said to be normal in its own time.

I am sure there are many young persons who would be grateful to their elders if they would kindly refrain at these times of sorrow from giving utterance to the sad thoughts which they must have. Of course the thoughts cannot be helped, nor would any of us wish to banish them altogether from our minds, but we can and should avoid giving them expression unless we are sure that those to whom we speak feel as we do.

I write this in the hope that some, who perhaps have never thought of the subject in this light, may see the need of greater considerateness, and that, as a result, some sensitive ones may suffer less. Such considerateness is Christlike. "I have many things to say unto you, but ye cannot bear them now."

LIVING UP TO ONE'S TEAPOTS.

BY ELIZABETH P. ALLAN.

In the hight of the "old china" craze appeared an amusing cartoon which many of you will remember—a willowy figure standing with clasped hands before a rare old teapot, an unusually good "find," saying in rapt tones, "Can I ever live up to it?" We laughed, all over the country, at this mockery of æsthetic despair; but let us remember, now that the laugh is over, what a deal of truth lies under the flippancy.

Can we bring up pure, refined children in dirty houses? Can we bring up healthy ones where the laws of health are broken? Can we make young people industrious if we give them nothing to do? Can we teach them self-restraint if we do not first restrain them? Being sure of a negative answer to these questions, let me put another, one to whose answering I point this little article: Can we form characters of honesty and truth in homes where shams are practiced? Do not answer too hastily. Remember how fashionable shams are, from the laced and ruffled squares that cover your rumpled pillows to the answer at the door that you are "not at home," when you are hanging over the banisters in the upper hall.

My friend boasted merrily to me the other day of a little corner bracket she had for holding a statuette. "It is supposed to be white marble," she said, "and is considered quite handsome and unique; in reality it is pine deftly covered with white, veined oilcloth." Her little boy was leaning against her as she spoke, taking lessons, was he not, in pretending to a style of living beyond their means?

Perhaps I was unduly sensitive about that little boy because I wince today, though my own boy has grown a foot or two since, at the remembrance of one of my shams in which he detected me. I had a long visit from a tiresome caller in one of my busiest hours and, when she went away, I exclaimed over the stupidity of people who would come when you were busy and stay so long. "Why, mamma!" said the little boy, who had been sitting quietly at my feet, "you told her you were so glad to see her and asked her not to go away so soon!"

Is this the reason that we look to our country homes, our farmhouses, to supply us with the fresh, vigorous life needed to keep the country from decadence? Because in those plain, solidly-built houses things go for what they really are, and there are no gingerbread pretences? The furnishing and ordering of our homes is no small part of the education of those little immortals who dwell in them while waiting for their heavenly mansions. Judgment must be laid to the line and righteousness to the plummet even in the bricks and mortar of our homes; even in the things we put into them for use and for adornment, that no habit of deceit or false showing may be formed as the days are going by, but that truth may be our constant and fearless guest here in these earthly abiding places as she is to be our friend and companion at God's right hand.

THE "MUSICAL EDUCATION."

BY KATE UPSON CLARK.

A singular fallacy has recently seized a large and important part of our population. It is that when a young person has reached the age of fifteen or sixteen he may be taken from a regular school—with which he is presumed to have finished—and put to the study of some branch of music, to come out at the end of three or four years as well educated as if he had continued to hammer away at science, mathematics and the languages. The consequence of this hallucination is that a crowd of young people are now loose in society, who are bumptiously conceited with the idea of their own accomplishments, and yet who may be sadly deficient in the homely art of spelling, cannot correctly construct an ordinary note, cannot understand common allusions to the great works of literature and are generally lacking in what has been for centuries considered true culture.

In place of this they may have a knowledge of counterpoint and fugue, considerable manual dexterity in performing upon some musical instrument and a general idea of the styles of music for which the great composers are severally distinguished. They may, perhaps, be able to thrill the soul with the presentation of some fine musical composition, and yet is it proper to call them "educated"? Indeed, can any amount of so-called "art education" atone for the lack of the plain literary knowledge needed in the conduct of everyday life? We must talk. Every one must write letters. In order to talk intelligently or to write intelligently a certain acquaintance with literature is absolutely necessary. Style, with tongue or pen, cannot be acquired without some study of the great masters of style. Familiarity with words, the essential weapons of our daily warfare, can come only by the study of words. Misspelling, bad grammar and ignorance of the great thoughts of great men, as they are preserved in literature, are lacks for which no study of music or painting or anything else can possibly atone.

It is contended that a certain mental discipline is obtained from the study of music which is quite as valuable for purposes of clear thinking as that which is gained from any other kind of study. Of course, any kind of strenuous pursuit of a high aim is in itself a discipline and a development. But it is doubtful whether the opinions of musicians on general topics demanding simply clear judgment are as valuable as those of men who have devoted the same time to the study of one of the learned professions that the other has given to music. At least, the common sense conclusion of any one who carefully considers this subject must be, that while it may be wise, as it is certainly very delightful, to give to a child a musical training, as an accompaniment to the old-fashioned literary sort, or as supplemental to it, it should not be done until his education in more essential respects has received thorough attention. As for thinking that simple or elaborate musical culture is going to supply him with as good an equipment for daily life and good society as the regular, time-honored sort—the idea is worthy of that new being whom the philosophers are calling the "mattoid."

ABRAHAM LINCOLN.

BY JEANNETTE A. GRANT.

In the providence of God, Mr. Lincoln was permitted to do more than any other man of this century for his country, for liberty and for mankind.—George S. Boutwell.

Those who were living on that sad April day in 1865, when the news of Lincoln's martyr death came like a dark cloud over the land, received a baptism of patriotism that influenced all their future life. Up to the hour of his sudden death by the assassin's hand, through the four years of terrible civil war, that lone, majestic figure stood forth a target for the abuse of many, the sympathy of some and the criticism of all. Then in a moment everything was changed. Friend and foe realized their irreparable loss. Men looked at each other and said, "What manner of man was he—that when he was with us we knew and appreciated so little, but now, that he is no longer among us, we realize was almost a god?" So through the decades that have passed since then they still question about the causes that made Abraham Lincoln the greatest man of his century.

But all in vain. It is beyond the power of the keenest analyst to say how and why this man who sprang from the lowest ranks of the people became the deliverer of his nation from its weight of human bondage. That he was prepared when the call came to him all the world knows. Careful biographers continue to give us every possible light upon the ancestry and early life of Lincoln, but though we read and ponder the interesting story its mystery remains unsolved. One who knew him long and intimately said of him, "All the wise and good things Mr. Lincoln ever did sprang or came out of his great reason, his conscience, his understanding and his heart, his love of truth, right and the good."

The little that has been recorded of the childhood of Lincoln seems gloomy. From his sad and overworked mother, whose sensitive frame gave way under her rough life on the frontier, he inherited a tendency to melancholy that at times almost overcame him. Yet with all the poverty and hardness of his early life there must have been much of that free and easy life out of doors so grateful to a boy, and he must have come very close to the heart of nature. From the sky and the forest and the stream he learned the beauty of serene living in accordance with the grand laws of the universe. From the unique characters in the sparsely settled neighborhoods where his father's roving disposition caused him to pitch the family tent, he gained his wonderful insight into human motives without the veneer of conventionality.

As soon as the lad began to work for his living, which he did partly on his father's not very flourishing farm and partly on the premises of neighbors who were glad to pay him niggardly wages for his help, he evinced peculiarities that made him interesting to all who met him. Innumerable are the anecdotes about "Abe," as he was familiarly called. It is curious to read that even when he was engaged in menial tasks, doing "chores" about the house to help the women on the farms where he was hired, lofty thoughts of the future were in his mind. He was none too fond of the hard work of these days, but went about it in a leisurely though sturdy manner, with many jokes and stories, which caused him to be a favorite among his fellow-workers. Once the woman of the house reproved him for carrying on his jokes with her girls in the kitchen, and asked him what he supposed would ever become of him. His reply was probably accepted as another of his numerous witticisms, for he said he was going to be President of the United States. There is no doubt that the youth who made this statement felt within him a spirit of prophecy which guided him through untoward surroundings and kept him true to the highest ideals.

The few books which it was possible for him to get hold of he devoured, reading them over and over and copying those extracts which gave him greatest satisfaction. He found it difficult to secure paper for his copies and would often jot down his favorite passages on boards until he could transfer them to paper. When he had transferred or committed to memory one set he shaved them off his board with a sharp knife and was ready for more. In this fashion also he did his problems in arithmetic, lying by the fire evenings and covering the surface of the great wooden shovel with his figures. Ingenuity was always a marked quality of the young frontiersman and no effort was too hard for him if by it he could accomplish his purpose. When he began to make speeches he concluded that he ought to study grammar and, as the only book he could hear of was six miles away, he started on foot to procure it.

* Earliest known portrait of Lincoln, taken about 1843, published first in McClure's Magazine and reproduced here by the permission of Hon. Robert T. Lincoln and Mr. S. S. McClure.

Abraham Lincoln's greatest claim to the confidence of his fellowmen was always his perfect honesty. "Honest Abe" was a kind of pet name for him in the rough communities where he passed his young manhood. The incident which led to his first being so designated has been often related. But in these days, when trusts are frequently betrayed and honesty in little things is disregarded, it does no harm to repeat the proofs of a great man's uprightness in small matters. While young Lincoln was clerk in a country store he one day sold a woman a small quantity of tea, for which she paid him and left. Later on he discovered that the weight he had used for weighing the tea was not the one he had intended to use, that he had taken pay for more tea than he gave the customer, so when closing time came he left the store and walked a long distance to return the extra money to the woman, who, of course, told the wonderful story of the honest clerk to every one she knew.

In 1833, when twenty-four years old, Lincoln was appointed to his first Government position, that of postmaster at New Salem, Ill. It was a small commission, and he sometimes carried the letters of the weekly mail in his hat for distribution as he went about the country to attend to his other business of surveying. But in this as in everything else honesty was the rule of his life. A good many years after, when the town and post office of New Salem were things of the past and Mr. Lincoln lived in another part of the State, a tardy Government collector made his appearance to square up the accounts of the defunct post office. Asking him to be seated, Mr. Lincoln went to his room and bringing back an old blue sock counted out from it the very pieces of money that the people of New Salem had paid into the office for their letters! Although poor as he could well be and live, the postmaster had been honest and considered the paltry sum belonging to the Government a sacred trust to be faithfully paid over when called for.

The crowning glory of his life was the Emancipation Proclamation. For this he will be honored while the histories of nations shall endure. But his whole life was a struggle to emancipate himself and his fellow-beings from the bonds of ignorance, falsehood and vice. He wanted everything and everybody to be on the right side.

Small fellowship of daily commonplace
We hold together, dear, constrained to go Diverging ways. Yet day by day I know
My life is sweeter for thy life's sweet grace;
And if we meet but for a moment's space,
Thy touch, thy word sets all the world aglow.
Faith soars serener, haunting doubts shrink low,
Abashed before the sunshine of thy face.

Nor press of crowd, nor waste of distance serves
To part us. Every hush of evening brings
Some hint of thee, true-hearted friend of mine;
And as the farther planet thrills and swerves
When towards it through the darkness Saturn swings,
Even so my spirit feels the spell of thine.

MRS. CLEVELAND'S MAIL.

From a charming description of A Day in Mrs. Cleveland's Life, in the last Harper's Bazar, we select that portion which gives an account of her voluminous correspondence:

Mrs. Cleveland's morning mail is found in the breakfast-room, and there she breaks the seals and runs her eye hastily over the contents. It is a smaller mail now than it was when she first entered the White House, for then she felt a natural curiosity to know what messages had been sent her by other persons than those within her circle of chosen friends. This novelty soon wore itself out, and by degrees the letters were sorted according to their externals, and sifted of such as bore evidence of coming from outside the group of bona fide personal correspondents. The sifting process was gradually transferred to other hands than her own, till now the letters actually left for her eyes are those the superscriptions of which have passed the trained scrutiny of the little staff of secretaries in the executive office. The stale trick of marking an envelope "Personal" deceives no one. It is the familiar handwriting which tells the story, not the style of stationery or the mode of address.

So large is the volume of material which comes with each mail from north, south, east and west addressed to Mrs. Cleveland that it has been found necessary to divide into classes those letters which appear deserving of any notice whatever. First in this category come the requests for charity in numberless forms. Appeals for money are abundant, of course. Next come calls for food and clothing. Then come demands that she will make an apron for a fair in Podunk, or dress a doll for a church exhibition at Smithville. Perhaps the funniest of the begging letters are those which crave the gift of a baby-carriage; they are usually accompanied by a clipping or copied quotation from an obscure local newspaper, in which an imaginative contributor describes the Clevelands as receiving a carload of little carriages as presents from inventors and manufacturers all over the country directly after the birth of each child. As a matter of fact, no such presents have ever come to them; but the fancy of the average Washington letter writer runs riot on occasion, and represents as a real happening what might have occurred if the whole guild of American carriage-makers had let themselves loose in search of a great advertisement.

A second class of letters are those in which Mrs. Cleveland is besought to use her influence with the President to procure offices or other political favors for somebody in whom the writers are interested. Even the wives of prominent congressmen have been known to bespeak in this way the interference of the President to obtain coveted committee assignments for their husbands in one or the other legislative chamber.

To the third class belong letters asking the use of Mrs. Cleveland's name as a patroness for some enterprise, as a subscriber for a book, or as subject of a dedicatory paragraph.

In a fourth class are grouped the conventional engraved invitations to take part in some festivity—a wedding, a reception, a christening, a birthday party, the anniversary of a society, the laying of a corner stone.

The almost unbroken rule in all these cases is for one of the executive clerks to write a stereotyped form of answer, consisting of a polite acknowledgment and a declination. Here and there a missive will have some distinctive feature which causes it to be set apart from the rest and brought to Mrs. Cleveland's notice when she retires from the breakfast-room and seats herself at her desk. A request that she will allow herself to be named as godmother for some budding genius of a new generation is rarely refused, an autograph is given where the circumstances warrant the belief that the courtesy will not be abused, and on rare—very rare—occasions a photograph is added. Now and then, at long intervals, one of the other requests receives a favorable response; but when the recipient is ungracious enough to share the news of his success with the public, the result is such a deluge of appeals and demands from chronic mendicants that the kindly feeling which prompted the experiment is turned to disgust, and the lesson costs the next thousand supplicants a prompt denial of their prayers.

Let no one falter who thinks he is right.

Closet and Altar

What Christ's prayer was all true prayers must be. You must pray with the great prayer in sight.

---

Whether a man walk out in the fields and say his prayers and feel God's presence, or whether he be in the church and feel God's presence, does he perceive him any the better because he is in a place of rest? If he does it comes from his own infirmity; the difference is not on God's side, for God is in all things and places alike, and is ever ready to give himself to us, in so far as we are able to receive him, and he knows God aright who sees him in all things.—John Tauler.

---

Whitsuntide brings with it such pledges of the continual presence of the Comforter, of a life arising out of death, of fellowship with all in heaven and all on earth, as must needs make every birthday a beautiful witness and symbol of the new birth of ourselves and of all creation, of the ultimate deliverance of everything that has in it decay or death.—F. D. Maurice.

---

O thou the Lord and Maker of life and light!
Full heavy are the burdens that do weigh
Our spirits earthward, as through twilight gray
We journey to the end and rest of night;
Though well we know to the deep inward sight
Darkness is but thy shadow, and the day
Where thou art never dies, but sends its ray
Through the wide universe with restless might.

O Lord of Light! Steep thou our souls in thee,
That when the daylight trembles into shade,
And falls the silence of mortality,
And all is done, we shall not be afraid
But pass from light to light; from earth's dull gleam
Into the very heart and heaven of our dream.

A test—surely one of the best tests—of the truth and reality and vigor of our Christian life lies in this—that when we anticipate the great life to come, however far speculation may endeavor to trace its course in the province of that mysterious land, we return to this thought, which satisfies completely all the deepest and best desires of our hearts—that where Christ is we are to be also.—R. W. Dale.

---

We join, O God, in the blessed strain thy holy children sang of old when, filled full of gladness and divine glory, they met to sing thy praise. We too would call upon all things to praise thee and join the song poured forth unto thee by all thy works in nature. We give thee thanks, hearty thanks, that thou hast given us once again to see the fair blossoms and smell the sweet fragrances that tell of coming glory, to behold the mild spring that tells of the glorious harvest. We beseech thee pour upon us thy sweet light that our hearts may be gladdened as our eyes are at this time by the light of the sun. Let the brightness of this day be but a prophecy to us of what shall come when the Sun of God shall shine upon all waiting souls. Lord God, there are flowers that need to be opened in us, sweet blossoms of charity and peace. Shine upon us that we may be lifted up from all meanness of spirit, and, living in the light of God, the beauty of the Lord may be upon us. Amen.

43. DECAPITATIONS.

I.

I paused by Doubting Hill one time
And mused, and thought my musings new;
"The world," I cried, "is dark and PRIME,"
And Echo quickly answered, "TWO."

II.

"For him whom fortune has accursed,
Or always has withheld his due,
O! what but disappointments FIRST?"
At once the Echo shouted, "TWO."

III.

"Life is a problem," then I sighed,
"Is Death the only solver true?"
"Life's mysteries end—O! ONE," I cried;
Then came the echoing answer, "TWO."

IV.

"Be still, my doubting heart," I said,
"The future's wisely hid from view;
Calm follows gale; when night is fled Up springs the WHOLE. Echo said, "TWO."

V.

"I know there is some happier clime,"
I said, "O soul, prepared for you Beyond Life's storms, where all is PRIME."
And Echo sweetly whispered, "TWO."

44. CHARADE.

Two-thirds of myself on Sundays you'll find Rejoicing the heart, informing the mind;
Then number them well, and write them out plain,
The rest of myself you'll find will remain.
As a whole I'm a friend, kindly and true,
Who brings good advice and precepts to you.
You can't make me young, for I have just told
That I am a pilgrim eighty years old.

46. BIBLICAL ACROSTIC.

1. At sound of the trumpet, my high walls fell down.
2. Diana's great city of ancient renown.
3. On seven hills throned, of the world I was queen.
4. Me Abraham left for a country unseen.
5. Of this "city of peace" was Melchizedek king.
6. To me, in fair Greece, Paul the gospel did bring.
7. In far Asia Minor my candle burned low.
8. Beneath my fair palm trees sweet waters did flow.
9. In a terrible storm was St. Paul cast away,
   But he safe reached my shore at the breaking of day.

47. ENIGMA.

When their all-subduing swords
Havoc spread 'mong Europe's hordes,
When their eagles chased the sun,
'Mong the Romans I was one.

Fleeing thence I entered trade,
But a fortune never made,
Wooed success in vain—instead
Drew invectives on my head.

I'm, when isolated, tall,
Yet in company I'm small.
Some my character assail,
Say that I should be in gaol.

But far other fate at last
Finds my form in plaster cast—
To the church and parliament
A support and ornament.

ALL AROUND THE HOUSE.

If pole rings from which draperies are suspended do not run easily, rub the pole until thoroughly smooth with kerosene.

The hammock need not be confined to summer use out of doors. If swung across the sitting-room or bedroom it makes a pleasant change for an invalid when tired of the bed or couch. A generous supply of down pillows is an essential accompaniment.

Each season brings fresh suggestions of ways for driving away that pest of the housekeeper—the little red ant. One of the latest is to place a piece of common tar upon a plate in the neighborhood where the ants congregate. Anything so simple is worth a trial.

A simple measure for keeping the feet in good condition on a long tramp is to rub castile soap inside the sole and heel of the stocking. This was done by our soldiers in the Civil War, and those who made "comfort bags" at that time will recall inclosing a small piece of soap for that express purpose.

Most housekeepers have learned the wisdom of having the sink high enough to wash dishes without stooping, but in many homes the cooking stove is still on too low a level for comfort. Let it be placed on a platform which will bring the top as high as the kitchen table, and a good deal of backache may be prevented.

One of the most trying pains which a child is called upon to endure is the earache. A simple and effective remedy is a bit of cotton batting, on which a pinch of black pepper has been placed and then dipped into well-heated sweet oil. Gather the batting around the pepper, tie snugly, dip in the oil and insert in the ear. A flannel bandage should be tied over the head to keep it warm.

Great care should be taken in the laundry to separate the handkerchiefs of persons suffering with colds from those which are used by the rest of the family. One person afflicted with a catarrhal affection may impart the trouble to an entire household. The best way to treat handkerchiefs of the character mentioned is to place them under water into which a quantity of kerosene oil has been poured and leave them for two or three days. Then add boiling water, wash with soap and rinse thoroughly. This will make disinfection sure.

We should feel it a finer thing to acquire the art of healing wounds than the art of calculating eclipses; a finer thing to occupy a post of toil in the cause of the ignorant and the suffering than a post of honor and authority in a palace; that of the two it is grander to learn how to "bind up the broken-hearted," or to "speak a word in season to the weary," than to learn how to investigate the secrets of nature or converse in five languages.—S. A. Tipple.

What know we of the world immense
Beyond the narrow ring of sense?
What should we know, who lounge about
The house we dwell in, nor find out,
Masked by a wall, the secret cell
Where the soul's priests in hiding dwell?
The winding stair that steals aloof
To chapel mysteries 'neath the roof?

To Cook Before An Audience

of bright housewives who are noting every step in the operation isn't easy. Besides, the cooking must be perfect.

Teachers of cookery know this and they use only what they can depend on every time.

That's why they all use Cleveland's Baking Powder. It never fails.

The Conversation Corner.

ALTHOUGH we have finished the Alphabet of New Members, let us, like little children (as we all are in this Corner), go back to our A B C's again, and enroll the candidates who have applied since our last publication of such letters.

MALDEN, MASS.

Dear Mr. Martin: I would like to become a Cornerer. I am nine years old. I belong to the Junior C. E. S. I have begun collecting stamps. I have about 145 now. I have the five-cent Newfoundland stamp but none with the dog's head on them. In my yard I have a garden of wild flowers. GEORGE B.

Do not the wild flowers get tame after being under the care of children a year or two? I think I should rather go for them in their own native home in the woods.

LINCOLN, NEB.

Dear Mr. Martin: I read the Corner every week and enjoy it very much. I wish you would put your picture in the Corner. I have no cat but a pug dog, whose name is Don. I have a collection of about 300 stamps. May I join the Corner? MARIAN B.

Yes, and I send certificate with photograph, said to be a very correct one.

MADISON, O.

Dear Mr. Martin: I am twelve years old and live with my uncle and aunt. I like to read the letters telling about Pomiuk and I send you —— cents for him, and I would be very glad of some Newfoundland stamps.

WALTER B.

What a Massachusetts-like sound your last name has! Did your father or grandfather emigrate to the "Western Reserve"?

BRATTLEBORO, VT.

Mr. Martin; Dear Sir: I am very glad to be a member of the Corner. I am thirteen years old. We found Pomiuk's picture in the World's Fair book. . . . Where I live, the Congregationalist church is on one side of us, the Episcopal church on the other side, and the Baptist on the other side of the street. We ought to be good! Back of us is the River and the Wantastiquet Mountain. There is a carriage road to the top. EMILY C.

How well I remember that high mountain in my boyhood, and that Congregational church, too! I can hear the echo of good Mr. Tyler's voice now, and some of his very words. I have the text, too, of a sermon which his predecessor, our "Huntington" of the New York letter, preached. But that was a long time ago!

WEST NEWBURY, VT.

Dear Mr. Martin: I have been reading the Conversation Corner quite a while. I am very much interested and would like to join. I am getting a collection of stamps. What constitutes a set of U. S. stamps now?

DWIGHT C.

Will some philatelist answer that ??

ELYRIA, O.

Dear Mr. Martin: . . . The other night my father looked up in the Genealogy and found that my great-grandfather's great-grandfather was the great-grandfather of Alfred Ely of Monson, to whom was addressed the copy of the Recorder which was on the outside cover of last week's Congregationalist [March 12]. He preached his first sermon in Monson in 1806 and was pastor there sixty years. When he began to study for the ministry he had only 14 dollars. The Corner Scrap-book just suits me. We have been having a regular March blizzard today. MARY E.

The last sentence is a telltale upon my delay in publishing the letter, for there is not much of a blizzard today—my windows are all open, a man is harrowing in the field opposite and old Kitty Clover is stretched out at full length on the floor, trying to keep cool. How little did good Dr. Ely think, when he subscribed for the new paper in Boston, that his name would be photographed eighty years afterwards on the paper and be read not only by his great-grandchildren in Massachusetts, but by his little great-granduiece in Ohio! His experience as a poor student fitted him to help similar boys who came to Monson Academy.

MARLBORO, MASS.

Dear Mr. Martin: I am four years old and I want to be a Cornerer. On my birthday my papa gave me some rubber boots. I have got four cats, Flossy, Flip-flop, Tim and Puff. The first two are Angora cats. I have a little black dog, Joe. My grandma reads me about Pomiuk. I am sorry for him and I got a little boy and went round and asked all the folks in the house for some pennies and I send them to you in this letter. HELEN F.

How do Joe and Flip-flop, etc., agree? My Kitty Clover is in deadly fear of his new dog-neighbor, Sancho!

WEST ROXBURY, MASS.

Dear Mr. Martin: Our class in Sunday school are interested in Pomiuk and would like to know more about him. If you have anything more about him, please put it in the Corner. I take the paper to Sunday school and read it to the children. RUTH F.

C comes next and the last mail brought a note from Dr. Grenfell in London, but nothing from Pomiuk:

I have no news from Rigolette. Evidently something has happened to the dog-mail. Better lend your old Captain to us for next winter—he is much more trustworthy . . . My love to Sarah Noah, the Cat and the other Cornerers—I am a member, you know.

DANVERS, MASS.

Dear Mr. Martin: Mamma is writing this, 'cause I don't know how to write. I will be five years old on Bunker Hill Day. I have a brother Russel. He calls me Dotty, 'cause he can't say Dorothy. Do you know what my name means? When you come to Danvers won't you come and see Russel and me? Do you play with children? I did like the little king of Spain stamps the best, but now I like the red dog best. I'm glad those dogs don't bite. Russel has been climbing up on mamma's chair and now he sits by her in a chair sucking his thumb. He wants to go in his "kib." Good-by. DOROTHY G.

When you come to study Greek you will see just how your name means the "gift of God." The two words are put together in reverse order to make Theodore, which means the same. Ought not Russel to have been named Theodore? Remember that names or words containing theo refer in some way to God, as Theophilus (a lover of God), theology (science of God), atheist (without God). Children named Theodore and Dorothy can think that God has given them to their homes and to the world—to do good and make others happy.

NORTH ADAMS, MASS.

Dear Mr. Martin: I am very much interested in the Corner, and would like to become a member. I live in the newest city of the commonwealth, near the corner of the State. Should you come out here you would pass through the Hoosac Tunnel, four and three-fourths miles long. We have the highest mountain in the State, Greylock. The boys of our Sunday school are going to take a tramp to the top next Saturday, nine miles. Fort Massachusetts, built in 1745, and destroyed by the Indians, was only a mile west of our city, and was commanded by Col. Ephraim Williams, after whom Williams College was named. The women raised $1,000 towards buying the fort site and to put up a monument. It is now marked by an elm tree. We have just formed a Fort Massachusetts Historical Society. We are anxious to secure "things" in use long ago for our rooms. I should like to see the Corner collection. Please send to my address a Scrap-book.

LYMAN G.

I called on an old farmer two days ago who has a large collection of "things" he has dug up on his farm, and which were "in use long ago"—by the Indians. Many of them were rude weapons, used to kill each other and foes like Colonel Williams.

Postal card: "Scrap-book received all safe. It is fine. Thanks. School time!" L. G.

Mr. Martin

CORNER SCRAP-BOOK.

Poor Richard. Do you know who he was? I intended to put something about him last week, as suggested by the query about Dr. Franklin, but we got off into calendars. "Poor Richard's Almanack" was one of Franklin's many devices for "conveying instruction among the common people," and it had an immense circulation and success. He began it in 1732—the year of Washington's birth—and continued it for twenty-five years. He says in his autobiography that he "reap'd considerable profit from it, vending annually near ten thousand." He filled every bit of space on the almanac pages with short, quaint proverbs, "chiefly such as inculcated industry and frugality." At the end of the twenty-five years he gathered all these into a "connected discourse" and prefixed it to the almanac. This article, he says, was copied "in all the newspapers of the [American] continent; reprinted in Great Britain on a broadside, to be stuck up in houses; two translations were made into French, and great numbers bought by the clergy and gentry, to distribute gratis among their poor parishioners and tenants." When I was a boy I used still to hear old people quote some saying from "Poor Richard." I have the impression that "R. Saunders' Almanac" led indirectly to the publication of Robert B. Thomas's "Old Farmer's Almanac," which was such an oracle in country homes. In my early days people, in talking about the weather, would always consult "old Robert B.," as the almanac, hung up under the mantelpiece or beside the clock, was familiarly called.

Poor Richard's Prophecies. He not only predicted eclipses, but other strange phenomena, which were said to have always come to pass. I take down from my shelf "Poor Richard" for 1736, and copy the following:

1. Before the middle of this year, a wind at N. East will arise, during which the water of the sea and rivers will be in such a manner raised, that great part of the towns of Boston, Newport, New York, Philadelphia, the low lands of Maryland and Virginia, and the town of Charleston in South Carolina will be under water. Happy will it be for the sugar and salt, standing in the cellars of those places, if there be tight roofs and ceilings overhead; otherwise, without being a conjurer, a man may easily foretell that such commodities will receive damage.

2. About the middle of the year, great numbers of vessels, fully laden, will be taken out of the ports aforesaid, by a power with which we are not now at war, and whose forces shall not be descried or seen, either coming or going. But in the end this may not be disadvantageous to those places.

In the next issue of the almanac he recorded the fulfillment of the predictions. Can you think how they were fulfilled?

Poor Richard's Maxims. That you may understand the character of the Almanack, I quote a few Maxims:

Drive thy business; let not that drive thee.

You may be more happy than princes, if you will be more virtuous.

The noblest question in the world is, What good may I do in it?

He is no clown that drives the plow, but he that doeth clownish things.

Thomas Jefferson's Plow. The last maxim suggests this paragraph. The Home has recently had an article on Jefferson. He was not a clown, for he not only used the plow but made one. He made it on mathematical principles. A plow consists of two wedges, a cutting wedge and a lifting wedge, and the Sage of Monticello discovered their proportions and the relation each bore to the other. Before his day no smith made two plows alike; from his day they were made in accordance with a mathematical rule. It was a remarkable man that could write the Declaration of Independence and construct a plow!

PROGRESS OF THE KINGDOM.

OUR OWN WORK.

Discouraging Decrease. The last statement of American Board receipts shows a deplorable falling off both in donations and legacies, not only for the month of April, but for the eight months of the financial year already passed. A total decrease of $37,480 during this period as compared with last year is a serious matter which should be brought to the consideration of our churches:

| | April, 1895. | April, 1896. |
|---|---|---|
| Regular donations, | $39,369.29 | $34,656.14 |
| Donations for special objects, | 1,992.36 | 2,904.09 |
| Legacies, | 21,374.60 | 8,452.87 |
| | $62,736.25 | $46,013.10 |
| | Eight mos. last year. | Eight mos. this year. |
| Regular donations, | $274,661.62 | $267,776.16 |
| Donations for special objects, | 30,204.10 | 29,318.39 |
| Legacies, | 113,168.26 | 83,458.59 |

A Plucky Texas Woman. The story of what an enterprising and consecrated Texas woman is doing in an isolated lumber town ought to put to shame the idle, half-hearted Christians in our prosperous churches, who, if they cannot engage in aggressive work themselves, can at least make it possible to provide pastors for such neglected districts. Three or four years ago Mrs. Sloan went to live in Pine Valley, Tex., a town of about 500 inhabitants, many of them employés in her husband's lumber works. Finding no regular Christian service, except a Baptist meeting held once a month, and having the blood of generations of Congregationalists in her veins, she determined to make an earnest effort to instruct and uplift these people. A schoolhouse was immediately built and a Sunday school organized, of which Mrs. Sloan still is superintendent and which soon grew to a membership of over 100. A preaching service for the fathers and mothers was the next pressing need and, nothing daunted that there was no Christian man to lead it, she planned a congregational form of worship, purchased some books of sermons and, aided by musical members of her own family, began to conduct a regular Sunday evening service. About a year ago this tireless woman organized a Y. P. S. C. E., which now has charge of the evening service; then she organized a Junior Endeavor Society, which is now supporting a student in our American College for Girls at Constantinople, and her latest Christian enterprise is a Y. P. S. C. E. among the converted convicts in the State penitentiary at Huntsville. Today this brave worker pleads for a man of God to minister to her people. A building for church purposes has been given by her husband, a congregation has been gathered and is in a responsive condition, the young people have been trained in Christian service—and all this through the efforts of one woman, single-handed and against great odds.

THE WORLD AROUND.

China Pays All American Claims. China deserves credit for having paid in full the last of the United States claims for losses in the riots in Sechuen. The mission property destroyed in that province alone was valued at $5,000,000 and was divided between American, Canadian, English and French Societies. At the time of the visit of the American Commission at Cheng-tu last January the claims of the American Methodists were promptly and cheerfully paid, the Chinese officials assisted them to buy property outright and publicly banqueted all the American missionaries together with the commissioners. Word now comes from Tientsin that Consul Read has secured complete restitution also for the Baptist Missionary Union losses. Thus all the American claims have been settled in a friendly manner, China paying the whole amount demanded. Secretary Duncan of the American Baptist Missionary Union thinks the three months' overland march of the American forces was good policy and doubtless made a desirable impression on the ignorant inhabitants of interior China.

Fraternity Among Indian Christians. We have received with interest the first number of The Indian Christian, the organ of the Indian Christian Association of Great Britain, published quarterly in London. The objects of this new organization are "to bring together the Indian Christians residing in Great Britain and to cement the relations between Indians and Europeans; to expose the evils of race prejudice, whenever and wherever practised, and to encourage the brotherhood of man; to bear the interest of the Indian Christian community and to help the interchange of thought between India and England and between the Indian Christians of all parts of India and the Colonies." A long article by Mr. Alfred Mundy, president of the association, on the Union of Indian Christians is the most prominent feature of the first issue of the new periodical. He denounces caste distinctions and denominational differences, which are largely responsible for the disintegration of the Indian Christian community, and says that "the surest and most effectual method of promoting union among ourselves is by trying our utmost to discourage denominationalism and to bring together all Indian Christians to form, if not one church, at least to subordinate sectarian views so far as to look upon members of different denominations as members of Christ's Church and as professing a faith common to all, though there may not be a complete agreement as to matters of ritual or ceremonial."

Mr. Mundy severely criticises the missionaries of the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel for the bigoted and exclusive spirit which they have shown in standing aloof from all conferences in which other denominations have met on a fraternal ground. He warmly commends the American Methodists for ignoring caste distinctions in choosing pastors and church officials. In this connection we are reminded of a sensible editorial which appeared in The Indian Witness, deploring the unnecessary ado so often made both in the Indian churches and in the reports sent home by the missionaries over the conversion of Brahman converts. The enthusiastic account of the baptism of a high caste woman gave rise to these pointed questions: "Would as much have been made of the baptism of the convert had she been a Pariah instead of a Brahman?" and "When missionaries celebrate the baptism of a Brahman with so much ceremony do they not fan into a flame the smoldering embers of caste feeling in the native church and thereby inflict serious injury upon it?"

PEN AND SCISSORS.

The missionaries of the Orthodox Russian Church among the Buriat tribes of Eastern Siberia have just accomplished an interesting piece of work in the translation of the liturgy of the Greek Church into the dialect of the Yakuts. This language possesses but 200 root words, so it has been necessary to use Russian terms for all words of deep religious significance.

The aggregate issues of the American Bible Society for the year ending March 31, 1896, were 1,750,282 volumes, being an increase of 169,155 over the issues of the previous twelve months. It is noteworthy that, for the first time in the society's history, the number of volumes circulated abroad exceeded the number circulated in the United States. In China alone nearly 400,000 volumes were distributed, and the entire circulation in foreign lands amounted to 890,150 volumes.

Mrs. Mary Clement Leavitt of the W. C. T. U., whose trip around the world gave her a fine opportunity for seeing missionary operations, is now in Boston and will be for two months. She is prepared to give an address on Christian Missions to any churches or societies and may be addressed care Kidder, Peabody & Co., Boston.

LESSON FOR MAY 31. Luke 21: 20-36.

THE DESTRUCTION OF JERUSALEM FORETOLD.

BY REV. A. E. DUNNING, D.D.

The passage under consideration in this lesson is Luke 21: 5–38. These words were Christ's final warning when he had left the temple for the last time, having been formally rejected by the Jews. His prophecy, so far as Luke gives it, he limited to the generation then living. That, Christ said, would not pass away till all the things he was speaking of should be fulfilled [v. 32]. This declaration helps us much in interpreting the highly figurative expressions. It is difficult for those who have not studied Oriental habits of thought to understand how these expressions can be true and yet not literal. Therefore many preachers and teachers in interpreting prophecy insist that grotesque events are predicted, which are out of all harmony with the past and the present. Peter's interpretation of Joel is a sufficient illustration of the difference between such a method of interpretation and that warranted by the Bible itself. The prophet had said, "It shall come to pass afterward," saith God, "I will pour out my Spirit. And I will shew wonders in the heavens and in the earth, blood, and fire, and pillars of smoke. The sun shall be turned into darkness and the moon into blood, before the great and terrible day of the Lord come." But Peter said of the scene at Pentecost, 'This is that which hath been spoken by the prophet Joel" [Acts 2: 16]. That prophecy, whose fulfillment some are still expecting to see in startling displays in the sky, proved to have pointed to the dawn of "that great and notable day," the period of the Christian Church, the dispensation of the Spirit in which we are living. This fact helps us to see that descriptions of coming physical changes are only language to convey ideas of spiritual movements not yet made. In this light we can understand how "the end of the world" is the end of the Jewish dispensation; the image of "the Son of man coming in a cloud" is the triumph of Christ's gospel over heathen nations, and the angels going forth "with a great sound of a trumpet" the ministry of the gospel going abroad throughout the world. We may sit with the Son of Man and his disciples on the Mount of Olives, and with them contemplate the overthrow, then near at hand, of the religious and civil system which God had established and which his chosen people had perverted. No historic event foretold in the Bible is fraught with more important lessons. Jesus told them:

I. Why Jerusalem was to be destroyed. God had been banished from it by the wickedness of the people. The sign that he had deserted it was the departure of Jesus that day for the last time from the temple. From that time it was a body which the spirit had left. It was certain to grow offensive in its corruption. The building on which the disciples were looking, just below them, across the ravine, was majestically beautiful. It is not strange that they said to their Master, as they pointed to its marble pillars and golden roofs shining in the sunlight, "Behold what manner of stones and what manner of buildings!" No sign of decay appeared on them. The temple was the pride of the Jew and of the Roman also. It was not even yet fully finished. Forty-six years had been spent in its construction, 10,000 skilled workmen had been employed in it. The ritual and sacrifices were never more imposing than then. Yet on that very day its fate was fixed. Dean Farrar says of it with ringing pathos: "The day was a common day; the hour a common hour; no thunder was throbbing in the blue, unclouded sky; no deep voices of departing deities were rolling through the golden doors; and yet—soundless to mortal ears in the unrippled air of eternity—the knell of her destiny had begun to toll; and, in the voiceless dialect of heaven, the fiat of her doom had been pronounced; and in that realm which knoweth not and needeth not any light save the light of God, the sun of her moral existence had gone down while it yet was day."

The significance of this strange historic event for us is that the spiritual life is the only life for the individual or for the nation. Without the spirit the body is dead and must decay. God at peace with us and within us is the only salvation. Nor will his love avail to save us if we reject him. No patriot ever loved his nation as Jesus loved Jerusalem. Even when her doom was fixed the sight of her glory overcame him, and his sorrow found expression in audible sobs, but his grief brought no relief to the lost city. Infinite love does not deliver from death those who treat it with indifference and contempt till their power to appreciate it has been destroyed.

II. The signs of the coming destruction of the city. The disciples thought that the overthrow of Jerusalem would be the end of the order of things then present and the ushering in of a new kingdom with Christ as the visible king of the nation; and they asked him what signs would indicate to them that the age had come to its end [Matt. 24: 3]. He told them what these signs were. Mark [13: 6–10] enumerates them more in detail than Luke. They are:

1. False Christs. Between that time and the final destruction of the temple the Jews hailed first one and then another promised deliverer as the Christ, and each one whom they followed led them nearer to the brink of the precipice over which they finally plunged to their doom.

2. Wars and rumors of wars. Society in Judea was in a constant ferment. Political parties became more and more imbittered against one another. The peace that had existed all over the world at Christ's birth was already giving place to the movements of armies and the tumult of battles.

3. Earthquakes and famine. Natural portents became ominous in the general disintegration of society; and the distractions of war, destroying the fruit of men's labors and withdrawing them from productive work, greatly increased the suffering from bad harvests.

4. Persecutions. In disappointment, poverty and suffering men were more ready than ever to blame others, and Jews as well as Romans naturally turned their hatred toward those who seemed to be undermining the religious systems on which the safety of society depended.

III. The significance of these things to Christ's disciples. His instructions were very simple and easy to be understood by those whose minds and hearts were fixed on him. Be watchful, he said, not to be deceived by false teachers, for they will have great power to deceive concerning me. Trust simply to my teaching. Be not afraid at the signs of which I have spoken. "Behold, I have told you all things beforehand." Speak what the Holy Spirit prompts you to speak in times of trial and peril, and be assured that if you continue faithful to me you shall be saved.

The way in which the Master taught his disciples has also its lesson for us. They had gone up on the slope of the Mount of Olives and were sitting there, perhaps in the shadow of one of the low fig trees. Perhaps he plucked from it a twig and said: See this swelling bud? Does not that sign convince you that summer is near? This is a parable. When you see the signs of which I have been telling you know that the crisis of this age is close at hand. They remembered his words a few years later. Beyond question the early church was saved by his warnings. The disciples, seeing the signs which Jesus had foretold, fled from Jerusalem to Pella, before the siege closed in on the city, and saved their lives.

One important thing for us to learn is that all these signs are the enemies of society at the present time, and that they warn us of peril in our social and national life. Yet in trouble, loss and suffering coming upon men because of sin there is a bright side. While the Jewish nation was hastening to its doom, the good news of Christ's deliverance from sin was being spread among all nations and even the evils themselves, which betokened the end, were made to aid in its spread. Awful suffering fell upon those who persistently sinned; but even their loss was made a blessing to the world. The destruction of that age was made the beginning of another and a better, just as the end of this dispensation will bring mankind to the glorious perfection of the kingdom of God.

We may not all understand alike these prophecies of Christ, but his instructions as to their duty will have the same meaning for all his own, and whatever disasters may now be hanging over the world no real harm can come to those who trust and obey Jesus Christ. "He that endureth to the end, the same shall be saved."

Y. P. S. C. E.

PRAYER MEETING.

BY REV. ISAAC OGDEN RANKIN.

Topic, May 31–June 6. Ready for Death. Matt. 24: 36–51.

To be ready for life is to be ready for death. Once there came a dark day in New England when the Connecticut legislature was in session. Some of the members were frightened and one of them moved to adjourn. Then rose a man of another spirit and said: "Mr. Speaker, I am opposed to adjourning. If this is the end of the world, as the honorable gentleman seems to fear, there is no place where I would rather be found than here where I am doing my duty to God and to the State. I move that candles be brought in and that we proceed to business."

This is the spirit in which Christ would have us live. The very uncertainty of the time of his coming, whether in death or in his final appearing, is at once an incentive and a test. No one knows, therefore some say, "Let us eat and drink for tomorrow we die"; but others answer more wisely, "He is surely coming, therefore let us be always ready, so that he can never find us sleeping." We must be about our Father's business, whether it is to be one day or sixty years that we have to wait.

If everybody knew when Christ was coming there would be crowds at church the Sunday before. If we knew just when we were to die there would be greater temptation than ever to trust to a death-bed repentance. That is the ideal of Christianity which some people make for themselves, and a cowardly sort of ideal it is. They want all that sin can give them, and all that heaven offers too. If they were sure they would be saved in the last ten minutes of life they would never think of serving Christ till those minutes came. They forget that salvation is salvation from sin and is expressed in words describing character, and that one who has loved sin all his life and only changed for fear of hell would be very uncomfortable indeed in heaven with none but holy acquaintances.

Death sorts people out according to their character. Every one goes to his own place. We are getting ready to have by becoming, and having would be of no more use to us than pictures to a blind man unless we become heavenly-minded, obedient to God's will, that is, and ready to enjoy what Christ enjoys.

There is no lack of warning. Our Lord takes our thought back to the flood, but Noah had been preaching year after year and all his warnings did not make a single man outside his own family ask for a berth in the ark. The good servant is always busy about his master's work, and so is never frightened at the thought of his return. He who is living as Christ would have him will have great joy in Christ's presence when he comes.

Parallel verses: Rom. 14: 7–12; 1 Cor. 15: 19–23; Phil. 1: 21; Rev. 14: 13; Luke 19: 12–26.

BOOK REVIEWS.

HISTORY.

Puritanism in the Old World and in the New, by Rev. J. Gregory. Dr. Bradford commends this book in a brief introduction, which is interesting for its account of the author, who is pastor of the church of St. Augustine in Edinburgh. It is therefore a Scotch view of a history which is treated as peculiarly English and American.

Mr. Gregory makes no pretense of adding to the original materials of Puritan history, but he has traversed the whole field and made an interesting and valuable restatement of the matter, independent in its views and conclusions. The material seems hardly to have been thoroughly fused in the author's mind, and the stream of narrative does not always flow clearly, but the book is readable and valuable.

Mr. Gregory traces the origin of Puritanism to Holland, pointing out the presence of large industrial colonies of Flemings in Eastern England among whom the doctrines of the Lollards took deep root, and the effects of the immense immigration during the time of the Spanish persecutions. It was in Norwich, too, where the Dutch refugees were most numerous, that Robert Browne gathered the first Separatist or independent church. But while acknowledging fully this earlier debt, in regard to the question of Dutch influence upon the Pilgrims during their stay in Holland he takes (and we think justly) the other view.

Nearly half the book is devoted to the history of Puritanism in the New World, and here we think that the matter treated is far too narrow for the title. The New England Congregationalism, which traces its descent to the Pilgrims of Plymouth and the Puritans of Massachusetts, is only one stream of Puritanism in America. Passing over this, however, we have found the familiar story of the growth, changes and controversies of the New England churches set forth in order with care and sympathy. There will be differences of opinion in regard to many of the points considered, but the book is a real addition to our none too long list of denominational histories. [Fleming H. Revell Co. $2.00.]

Lorenzo de' Medici and Florence in the Fifteenth Century, by E. Armstrong. This book belongs to the Heroes of the Nations Series, and treats of one of the most interesting political and social eras of modern history. What Augustus did on a large scale Cosimo, Piero and Lorenzo de' Medici did on the small, yet in its relations world-wide, stage of Florentine life—ruled through the forms of the republic, while they held all real power in their own hands. "It would have been impossible to find a milder and more peaceable tyrant," says Guicciardini, and the whole story has certain suggestive relations to our own mild and peaceable "bosses." The style limps a little here and there and the interest is lost in the confusion of details, but the book is well made, beautifully illustrated and introduces us fully to one of the great eras of human life. [G. P. Putnam's Sons. $1.50.]

The Early Life of Abraham Lincoln, by Ida M. Tarbell, assisted by T. McCan Davis. Miss Tarbell has been an indefatigable gleaner in the field of the Lincoln biography. It is only a man of the very first rank who can be made the subject of such careful gathering of trivial as well as important particulars without being made ridiculous, but the position of Lincoln was so peculiar and the strength of his personal character so marked that these things only serve as foil and background to his essential greatness. The illustrations are valuable and interesting. We shall look with pleasure to the completion of this book. [S. S. McClure, Limited. $1.00.]

The History of Oratory from the Age of Pericles to the Present Time. In a volume of 440 pages Prof. Lorenzo Sears of Brown University has given us a sketch of this subject which shows a fine sense of historical perspective and skill in personal characterization. The history of the world is so large that these special histories are growing more useful and indispensable every day, and this one is to be especially commended. [S. C. Griggs & Co. $1.50.]

RELIGIOUS.

Rational Theology; or Ethical and Theological Essays, by John Milton Williams, D. D. This is the second volume of a work already noticed in our columns. It is made up of careful papers reprinted from the reviews, and deals with such difficult subjects as the divine limitations, the reconciliation of free agency and divine sovereignty, and such practical ones as woman's sphere and duties. As a treatise on theology, setting forth the new school view as against the older Calvinism, the book would have gained by a recasting and orderly arrangement of thought and materials. As it is, it is a fearless, frank and suggestive presentation of the author's views upon the subjects he treats. [Charles H. Kerr & Co. $1.25.]

Rev. P. W. Sinks has published, under the title of Popular Amusements and the Christian Life, a series of addresses delivered to his own church, with the conviction that a pastor is the proper person to discuss this perplexing problem. Not ignoring the possibility of an honest difference of opinion and without attempting to lay down rules of individual duty, he considers in a fair and candid manner the Christian's attitude toward the dance, the card table and the theater and seeks to indicate the great fundamental principles which must settle this complicated question. We heartily commend the book, especially to young people who sincerely desire guidance in this matter. [Fleming H. Revell Co. 75 cents.]

Bishop Merrill of the Methodist Episcopal Church has written a little book (a booklet we regret to find him calling it) on The Crisis of This World, or the Dominion and Doom of the Devil. It is a brief and earnest warning—"a sermon enlarged"—against the easy doctrines of modern popular eschatology which refine the devil into a figure of speech and hell into a metaphor. Such a warning is needed. [Cranston & Curts. 60 cents.]

Prof. G. H. S. Walpole of the General Theological Seminary, New York, has gathered from a wide range of reading Daily Teachings for the Christian Year. The selections are catholic, devout and of high literary and intellectual quality. [Brentano. $1.50.]

A new edition of the Life of Jesus the Christ by Henry Ward Beecher comes to us in a single large volume. This is the completed edition and needs no fresh characterization for our readers. [E. B. Treat. $2.50.]

STORIES.

Mr. F. Hopkinson Smith is a man of strong prejudices, as recent ill considered utterances in regard to missionary work serve to show, and there are traces of the same failing in Tom Grogan, which we would not like to accept as an impartial sketch of modern labor leaders. The book is a very strong one, however, and the type of pothouse politician and self-seeking agitator depicted has undoubtedly often appeared in labor agitations. No one can help liking the strong, loving and wholly admirable woman who is the heroine of the story and following her fortunes with sympathy and delight to the end. And the moral tone of the book is distinctly elevating throughout. Mr. Reinhart's illustrations are capital. [Houghton, Mifflin & Co. $1.50.]

F. Marion Crawford's latest novel, Adam Johnstone's Son, is a quiet story with a slight plot, although a thread of mystery running through it awakens a mild interest in the reader. The characters, which are few in number, are English people visiting a hotel in Italy. Most of the book is taken up with conversations, that are at times decidedly tame, between two ordinary young lovers, whose characters have, however, a certain attractiveness. But the most serious defect of the story is its low standard of manly virtue and honor. [Macmillan & Co. $1.50.]

Under the title of The Ebbing of the Tide. Louis Becke has given us another volume of short South Sea Island stories. White traders and languid, bewitching, native maidens are for the most part the heroes and heroines of these tales. Nearly every one contains a murder or two, some of them horribly brutal and barbarous, but now and then one like Ninia is a simple idyl of the tropics. The stories are told with considerable dramatic power and to many the strange, picturesque setting will possess a fascination. [J. B. Lippincott Co. $1.25.]

The Second Opportunity of Mr. Staplehurst, by W. Pett Ridge, is a rather clever story, but disappointing. If a successful man of forty could have the opportunity of being put back twenty years, it is to be hoped that he could manage better than did Mr. Staplehurst, many of whose mistakes would be impossible to a thoroughly high-minded man. The experience is fairly well told, with occasional bright passages, some natural conversation and one or two interesting characters, but as a whole the work is slight and has little claim to permanence. [Harper & Bros. $1.25.]

I Married a Wife, by John Strange Winter, is a bright English story of love and of the trials of a husband with a too philanthropic wife devoted to "slumming." The troubles which her unselfish but inconsiderate actions brought upon them both and upon the regiment in which the husband served, and her final cure, are well and amusingly told, and the book is readable throughout. [Frederick A. Stokes Co. [75 cents.]

The Broom Squire, by S. Baring Gould. The author of this book has the experience of successful writing behind him, but he is so hampered by the narrow views of a provincial Englishman that he utterly spoils what comes near being a very strong story. As it is it is only limping tragedy, marred by old womanish flings and sneers at theological opponents, and leaving the reader dissatisfied both with methods and results. [Frederick A. Stokes. $1.25.]

CHILDREN'S BOOKS.

The Adventures of Hatim Tai is a translation from the Persian by Duncan Forbes, nd is included in the series of Classics for Children. It is a story in seven parts full f remarkable adventures, and inevitably eminds one of the Arabian Nights. Hatim s represented as the personification of brav-ry, wisdom and generosity, and in all his hrilling experiences he never fails to dis-lay these virtues. His life is spent in re-ieving the distress of his fellow-creatures. He attempts to help a young prince whose nly hope of winning the beautiful princess whom he loves lies in his ability to answer even questions of her proposing, and in he effort he meets with the varied experi-nces which form this story. Much of the anguage is above the comprehension of hildren, yet most of them will understand nough to enjoy the tale, from which they nust learn lessons of kindness, gentleness nd heroism. [Ginn & Co. 50 cents.]

Tommy Toddles, by Albert Lee, is a curi-us story of a little boy whose Noah's ark nimals suddenly came to life and ran away rom him. He started out in search of hem and was joined by a Woolly Sheep hat could talk and an ex-Pirate. Together hey met many curious characters, such as he Welsh Rabbit, the Horse-Radish and he Penguin, all of whom are addicted to unning and making jokes. Much of the umor of the book consists in slightly hanging common expressions as, "A hair n the head is worth two on the brush," 'The Pen-guin is mightier than the Sword-ish," while nonsense rhymes are scattered hrough the story. The illustrations, by Peter S. Newell, are very amusing and add o the effectiveness of the tale. It is a book hat children delight in, even though they miss the point of some of the jokes and puns. [Harper & Bros. $1.25.]

Boys of The Central, a high school story, by I. T. Thurston. This is a story of American public school life told in a bright and interesting way, and likely to be use-ful in suggesting that organization for good is as possible as combination for evil ends. The book has movement, adventure enough of a probable kind and shows the growth of character without moralizing or preaching. A completely satisfactory ending is reached by an improbable, not to say violent, wrench of circumstances at the last. Hav-ing established his character, the hero did not need the rehabilitation of his family circumstances, and the book would have had a stronger ending without it. With this exception we like the book very much. [A. I. Bradley & Co. $1.00.]

The Brownings for the Young, edited by Frederic G. Kenyon, is a book of selections from the best poems of Robert and Eliza-beth Barrett Browning. The combination of the two names in a single volume at least insures variety, as the verse of husband and wife is of essentially different texture. A smaller book than this would have held what seems to us appropriate for childhood, but the poems which we would choose are, with few exceptions, included here with some others which we do not think at all appropriate. [Macmillan & Co. 40 cents.]

Songs and Rhymes for the Little Ones, compiled by Mary Whitney Morrison (Jenny Wallis). This is a new edition of a book which mothers will especially value. It is well printed in large type and the selections are excellent. [Joseph Knight Co. $1.50.]

MISCELLANEOUS.

Regeneration appears as a reply to Max Nordau's Degeneration. It would be un-gracious to say that it was written by an English snob, though that would be follow-ing closely the author's example; for he begins by a personal disparagement of Nor-dau, charging him with writing as a nar-row-minded German Jew and an enemy to France. This might be overlooked if after-wards the book rose to that calm and dis-passionate survey of his opponent's posi-tion which we expect of one claiming to stand for God and righteousness. But it does not do this. Nor does it deal fairly with the aims or the execution of Degener-ation. One who had not read the latter book would obtain no just idea of it from this author. Nordau maintains that cer-tain fashionable authors and artists—among them Baudelain, Paul Verlaine, Dante Ros-setti, Swinburne, Walt Whitman, Maeter-linck, Tolstoi, Wagner, Ibsen, Nietzsche and Zola—have contributed largely to form what he calls degenerate conditions in fin-de siècle upper class society; and that these authors were or are themselves degenerates, partial imbeciles. Regeneration does not distinguish adequately the two parts of this proposition. In its ill-tempered zeal to steady the ark of religion and true art, it forgets that it is dealing with questions of fact. The evidences of imbecility in such men as Baudelain and Verlaine and Nietz-sche and Maeterlinck are clearly shown by Nordau. Were this admitted and the wor-thy aim of Degeneration recognized, the reader would be more likely to appreciate certain valid positions of Regeneration—such as that great men and political and social institutions are more powerful than current literature and art in raising or lowering the standard of society. On the whole, we wish that the book might have been written by the author of its excellent introduction, Prof. Nicolas Murray Butler of Columbia College. [G. P. Putnam's Sons. $1.75.]

Four Handed Folk, by Olive Thorne Mil-ler, is an entertaining account of various queer pets, chiefly of the monkey tribe, whose habits Mrs. Miller has studied at her leisure. She tells of their curious pranks and antics in the same charming style which has made her bird studies so popular, and the book is full of interesting information. People who are fond of monkeys surely owe Mrs. Miller a debt of gratitude for giving them the benefit of her studies, as few would enjoy living with such pets. Not to speak of their lack of table manners, which causes them to throw wads of half-eaten food wherever they choose, the presence of a little marmoset which is liable to jump into any one's open mouth, or a lemur which insists on combing one's hair, would make a nervous person slightly uncomfort-able. The chapters on Monkey Babies and Monkeys Who Work are of especial inter-est. [Houghton, Mifflin & Co. $1.25.]

The Feasts of Autolycus, by Elizabeth Robins Pennell. These papers, first printed in the Pall Mall Gazette, refer rather to the time and manner of serving than to the food itself. They make a book of dainty living in which æsthetics counts for more than cookery. "But whatever your sand-wich," writes Mrs. Pennell, "above all things see that its proportions be delicate and symmetrical; that it please the eye be-fore ever the first fragment has passed into the mouth." There is, indeed, a delicate humor throughout the book which is de-cidedly appetizing, and lovers of good liv-ing as well as lovers of lovers of good living will get many hints from its pages. [Mer-riam Co. $1.25.]

A new edition of Wealth Against Com-monwealth, the well-known history of the greatest of American monopolies, by Henry Demarest Lloyd, has reached us. Every one ought to read it to learn what wealth with-out a conscience is capable of. [Harper & Brothers. $1.00.]

The Living Topics Cyclopedia is an at-tempt to bring knowledge down to date in supplement to the encyclopedias. Judging by the first volume, A to Boy, the work seems to be very well done and likely to be useful for the unindexed places of the recent past. The page numbering by repe-titions of the alphabet in an oddity. [John B. Alden. 50 cents per vol.]

The Gospel of Buddha, told by Paul Carus, comes to us in a fourth revised edition from the Open Court Publishing Co. [$1.00.]

There is a half-hour's amusement, more or less, according to the susceptibility of the examiner, in The Evolution of Woman, by Harry Whitney McVickar. But let him stick to the pictures, for the verse is like Paul's stature—contemptible. [Harper & Brothers. $2.00.]

Some who amused themselves with Bella-my's Century of Charades may be interested in Open Sesame, One Hundred Answers in Rhyme, by Harlan H. Ballard. Some of the rhymes are quite as clever as the charades which suggested them, but others are rather crude. [Joseph Knight Co. $1.00.]

We have received Vol. II. of the Report of the Commissioner of Education for 1892-93 from the Government printing office in Washington.

NOTES.

—— The Century Company's exhibition of poster designs has been exciting much interest in New York.

—— The death of H. C. Bunner, editor of Puck, removes a striking and interesting fig-ure from American literature.

—— Sir John Millais, the new president of the London Royal Academy, has just under-gone an operation for what is reported to be cancer of the throat induced by excessive smoking.

—— The New York Metropolitan Museum shows at its spring opening three new pic-tures purchased for the Catharine Wolfe fund, the Whale Ship by Turner, a landscape by Rousseau and a figure piece by Lord Leigh-ton.

—— The scale of modern undergraduate college expenditure is suggested, as well as the reaction from an exclusive devotion to athletics, in the recent gift of $1,500 from the Junior Class in Yale to the university library from the profits of this year's junior prome-nade.

—— Miss Mary E. Wilkins's serial story, promised for Harper's Magazine, has been three-fourths completed, but the beginning of its appearance will be postponed from July till January on account of her breakdown of health and enforced suspension of literary work.

—— The public has not taken very kindly to the first installment of Stevenson's table-talk, reported by Mrs. Isobel Strong in Scrib-ner's Magazine. The truth is that trivialities are trivialities in a great author's case as in all others, and it needs a special gift of self-suppression to be a Boswell.

—— The Young Men's Era, the international newspaper of the Young Men's Christian As-sociation, announces that it has passed into the hands of a new publisher. The purpose of the new managers is to suspend publication during the summer but to begin again in the autumn, with a new form and increased facil-ities.

—— Among the recently disinterred manuscripts of Charlotte Brontë, says the London Bookman, has been found a fairy tale entitled The Adventures of Edwin and Alembert. It is a curious and remarkable anticipation of Ruskin's The King of the Golden River. Mr. Ruskin has read the story and pronounces it finer than his own.

—— The new English Dictionary, which in twelve years has not progressed as far as the end of D, seems likely to be stopped because of the enormous expense of the undertaking. The delegates of the Clarendon Press of Oxford have suggested certain curtailments of method and the editors are considering whether it would not be better to abandon the enterprise altogether. Perhaps some English millionaire who wishes to make himself a monument will arise to bear the cost of continuance upon the original plan.

—— Under the New York law, allowing the loan of libraries by the regents of the State University, more than a hundred libraries a year are now sent out. The fee for six months' use is not more than five dollars, which includes transportation both ways and catalogues, record blanks, etc. By a recent extension of the system the libraries are offered to private reading clubs at a slightly larger expense. There is also an arrangement for instruction by lectures under the university extension system, which meets with increasing approval.

PASSING COMMENT.

It must have been a novel, even if perhaps a rather trying, experience for those pastors outside our denomination to attempt to exploit Congregationalism at the St. Louis Club the other evening. But what an exercise in broadening Christian sympathy! It would be interesting to know the real reason why two of the invited brethren failed to take the parts assigned them. Were they unable to see any good in our polity, or did they fear to proclaim it lest they be deemed disloyal to their own denominations?

The plans for a foreign department of work by the H. M. S. of a Southern State are unusual but will doubtless be generally approved, considering the object.

Home missions have been at a "white heat" of late in Illinois, writes a correspondent. That condition was brought about to some extent by other agents than the speakers if the figures registered by the thermometer are regarded.

Doubtless the feeling of a western Massachusetts church is shared in other places in a desire for better congregational singing. The good work which is being accomplished in this instance can be attempted just as well elsewhere.

The recent bombardment of Congregationalism in the "Hub" would not be directed amiss if turned on other large cities if reason and reports are trustworthy. Patience and perseverance continue to be victors in some localities.

That New Hampshire church which will soon dedicate its new edifice intends not to stop short of making its home as beautiful for situation and surroundings as possible.

It is good to see evidences of new life in a number of churches in New York State.

Possibly there would be more trials of a 100

r cent. day in our Sunday schools if the ospects of success promised anything like e results in a Bay State school.

Congregationalists generally should partici-te in the joyous celebrations in Ohio and diana, especially congratulating the church the latter State that it successfully resisted e efforts of two of its pastors to lead it at e time into another fold.

THE INDIANA STATE MEETING.

The noble edifice of the old First Church, ichigan City, had been swept and garnished r the great occasion, and from "turret to ndation stone" stood freshly renovated d beautiful, and smiled a thousand wel-mes, May 12–14, to the 100 incoming guests. v. W. C. Gordon, the pastor, and his en-usiastic people outdid themselves. Mrs. askell's generosity shone in the new and egant equipment. It was the anniversary a memorable convention held here in 1846. here were many reasons why it should be e most splendid Congregational association er held in Indiana, and it was.

The meeting was a grand success in ar-ngement, program, historic interest and ogressive spirit, and will mark an epoch in ngregationalism in the Hoosier State. Dr. H. Crum proved to be a prompt and effi-ent moderator, and pushed the crowded and mprehensive program through with dis-tch. The lake breezes modified the ex-me heat.

In the expectant attitude of the cultured ngregation which gathered Tuesday night listen to the opening sermon, there was hearty stimulus to Dr. A. H. Ball, the eacher. His text was Eph. 5: 25–27, and he eached to his aroused and responsive con-egation a sermon admirable in structure, autiful in literary form, and hopeful and spiring in spirit, upon The Perfect Church. struck a high level of thought which was aintained throughout the meeting.

Wednesday was denominational day, de-ted to a rapid and spirited review of the ndition of the churches at home and abroad, th reports of local registrars and such elo-ent presentation of missionary facts and otives as is usually furnished by Secretaries D. Wiard, G. A. Hood and A. N. Hitch-ck, the effective words of Mrs. H. S. Cas-ll and others, including voices from the reign and home fields. Supt. E. D. Curtis viewed the growth of the last decade. Pres-t figures show that the churches number ty-six, a gain of thirty-two in ten years; nisters forty, a gain of twenty-four; home ssionaries, twenty-nine, a gain of twenty-ir; home expenditures, $56,268, more than uble the amount ten years ago; church embers 4,660, also more than doubled, and nevolences $4,632, a gain of over $2,600. P. S. C. E members number 1,500.

The center and glory of the occasion was in e banquet, the after-dinner speeches and e papers of Wednesday evening. The re-st was rich, delicate and generous, and was rved with all the refinements of modern linary standards. The after "feast of rea-n and flow of soul" was participated in by r. N. A. Hyde, the Nestor of the State, Dr. M. Williams and Rev. C. H. Rogers, former stors, and Dr. J. M. Sturtevant, who, with r. G. S. F. Savage, represented the National ouncil. Dr. J. H. Crum presided and Prof. M. Hall, a visiting "Christian" brother, ointed to his three Senior Class pupils in at-ndance and, humorously depicting his own obable transition to the Congregational ld, quoted "God be with you till we meet ain." The themes were reminiscent of Con-egational beginnings, pre-historic Congre-tionalism and the remarkable developments wards Christian unity now in progress, and ere were echoes from the Piqua Conference. The papers by Dr. Savage on The Internal istory of the Council of 1846, by Dr. Sturte-nt on Early Congregationalism in the West d by Dr. Hyde on Indiana Reminiscences were listened to with interested attention. An elegant souvenir program, richly illustrated and full of information, was presented each guest.

Thursday also was a great day, with a series of able addresses cumulative in effect and closing with a magnificent audience to listen to Professor McKenzie of Chicago Seminary at night. The program was educational in purpose and was too full for impromptu discussion. In speaking of the Modern Church, Rev. J. S. Ainslie presented the objective readjustments necessary to meet changed modern conditions. Rev. F. E. Dewhurst spoke eloquently and beautifully on the Church as a Witness to the Whole of Life, and Rev. W. A. Bartlett, who soon leaves for Massachusetts, gave a stirring address on Worship as a Lost Art, followed by Prof. W. E. Teale of Michigan City on Music and the Church Service. Miss K. M. Funk, the gifted soprano of the New England Church, Chicago, sang solos. She attended the various sessions and assisted the choir and Professor Teale in the pleasing and perfected service rendered.

The sociological session elicited unusual interest. Supt. Alexander Johnson of the State Institution for Feeble-Minded Children, a stanch Congregationalist, by the way, made an effective plea for The Christian as a Citizen. He advocated isolated detention in county jails; indefinite sentences to prison life, with parole for the cured ones; and the erection of an intermediary control school for first offenders, between the reform school and the prisons. Prof. Graham Taylor followed with a grand and telling speech on The Church Extending a Hand to the World —the outside home world and the outside work world.

Prof. W. D. McKenzie gave the closing address on The Authority of the Christian Teacher. His was a strong, simple and spiritual discourse, bringing out the points for Sunday school teachers as for ministers. The members of the association were extended the courtesy of a visit to the State prison by Warden Harley. The association will meet with the Kokomo Church in 1897.

MISSOURI ASSOCIATION.

For Missouri May is the month of roses; and while the fiercest summer heat sometimes falls upon our annual gatherings, this year three perfect days of blue skies, May 5–7, bracing breezes and flowery fragrance added their benediction to the abounding hospitality of Lamar's cordial citizens. This delightful community is remote and difficult of access for delegates from the eastern and northern regions, many of whom traveled further than from Boston to Philadelphia to be present, but the place was a wise selection in view of the important interests and still more important prospects in this section. The sessions were held in the beautiful new edifice which is one of the achievements of Rev. C. A. Greenlees's administration. The attendance was unusually small, especially of laymen, a fact due to the financial burdens which are oppressing every church in the State. The program, under the efficient moderatorship of Rev. J. W. Sutherland, was admirably carried out as regards the interest of its themes and the exceptionally high order of their treatment.

The opening sermon was by Dr. G. C. Adams, who has earned the high honor and love of his brethren by his fifteen years of persistent and powerful work with the Compton Hill Church in St. Louis, where over 1,000 members have been gathered during his pastorate, nearly all of whom have come from other than originally Congregational circles. Taking for his text, "He saw and believed," he gave a masterly analysis of John's gospel, and a luminous illustration of the way in which Jesus dealt with his followers so as to produce strong conviction, a religion of the heart and the power to make others imitators of their Master. The communion service was followed by a tender and appropriate address from Dr. N. H. Whittlesey in behalf of our ministerial veterans.

Wednesday morning was, as usual, devoted to the interests of education in our State. The various academies had warm words of commendation from several visitors, showing that their important work is making excellent progress. President Fuller and Principal Howland represented the college and academy departments at Drury, where there is rejoicing over the completed endowment of $200,000, but where there is not yet relief from immediate financial pressure. In the increasingly high quality of scholarship and the growing constituency of the college there is gratifying progress. We are specially fortunate in having the united and enthusiastic support of the whole State for our one college. Such a movement as is now going on in Kansas to build at Wichita a rival to Washburn, through the extraordinary encouragement of our Education Society, would be an impossibility with us.

Thursday morning, given to our home missionary work, was a session of deep interest. Superintendent Wray's report had its lights and shadows, but revealed progress along the lines of wise and far-seeing reconstruction of the work. In both our cities and in our country churches reduced appropriations have wrought havoc, yet called out some magnificent heroism. It is coming to be the regretful conviction of our leaders that the New York officers are so misled by the splendors of their Oklahoma boom as to be unable to see opportunities for solid and sure progress nearer home. We are hoping that they will sometime get a glimpse of the great fruit belt of southern Missouri and northern Arkansas, into which thousands of fugitives from the drought-smitten Northwest are pouring for permanent occupation, and give us some of the dollars that are now being squandered upon mushroom towns farther west.

Among the many strong papers presented it will not be invidious to single out Dr. Albert Bushnell's upon A Drawing Church and Rev. F. V. Stevens's elaborate study of the South Carolina dispensary system as exceptionally strong. Rev. Pearse Pinch, our latest and highly prized acquisition from Kansas, gave a model treatment to the labor problem, and Dr. Michael Burnham's address upon Spiritual Power was in his most masterly and impassioned vein.

The secretaries of the benevolent societies were as warmly welcomed as ever, and had their allotted time increased by the business committee instead of cut short as sometimes happens. Our committee on resolutions made tender mention of Dr. E. K. Alden, and specially indorsed the jubilee plans of the A. M. A. The meeting next year at St. Louis with the Compton Hill Church is to combine the home and foreign departments of woman's work, and is to lay special stress upon securing delegates from our Christian Endeavor Societies.

THE KANSAS ASSOCIATION.

Bright skies and historic associations had their influence in bringing 200 ministers and delegates to Lawrence for the annual sessions of the General Association, May 7–10. The writer was entertained in a house which survived the desolation of the Quantrill Raid. Stories of hairbreadth escapes at the massacre and of the thrilling events which centered around Lawrence in ante-bellum times are still told by old inhabitants to eager listeners.

Plymouth Church was our host. Hon. Edwin Tucker was chosen moderator. The statistical clerk's report showed 183 churches and 13,214 members—a gain of 497.

The theme which by prearrangement governed the thought throughout was The Responsibility of the Church, viewed, success-ively, as respects the church's own spiritual life, for the evangelization of its own neighborhood, for the young, for social and civic reform, and for the conversion of the world. This theme controlled the impressive opening sermon by Rev. H. D. Herr and made thought continuous and progressive, while yet varied, from day to day, working towards a climax in the foreign missionary meeting of the closing session. The intellectual and spiritual tone of the meeting was high. Perfect unity of feeling prevailed. Every person announced on the program performed his part. Dr. Michael Burnham re-enforced the thought on The Responsibility of the Church for the Young with a powerful address on The Opportunity of the Church With the Young, and on the same evening Rev. J. L. Sewall spoke effectively on Christian Endeavor.

The Responsibility of Each Church for the Evangelization of Its Own Neighborhood was a subject which elicited much and favorable interest, it being in line with new activity by several churches to establish branch work in country districts. Rev. Messrs. Sheldon and Dougherty voiced general sentiments in advocating wise and earnest activity by Christians in the cause of social and civic reform, the former stating the principles and the latter asking, What are you going to do about it?

The Sunday school was given a prominent place. Superintendents Sutherland and Bush presented encouraging reports, showing growth in the number and efficiency of our schools. Seldom does Kansas hear better papers on Sunday school themes than that on Bible Study, by Prof. L. D. Whittemore, and on Primary Work, by Mrs. F. P. Hogbin of Sabetha.

The anniversary of the Kansas Home Missionary Society occupied two hours on Friday afternoon. Sixty-two missionary pastors have been employed during the year supplying seventy-five churches and thirty-nine stations, with 8,300 persons in the Sunday congregations and 6,600 in the Sunday schools. Fifty missionary churches report revivals of religion and 595 new members have been added. Five new churches have been organized, all of which are served without additional expense to the C. H. M. S. While hard times have prevailed, much less distressing poverty has been experienced than during the preceding year. The churches have been strengthened spiritually and pastors and churches adapt themselves nobly to trying conditions necessitated by the lessened resources of the people and of the C. H. M. S. The contributions to the C. H. M. S. were $4,183, besides a legacy of $500. Great interest was awakened by the story of their work told by four young home missionaries, three of them from the frontier.

Washburn College was represented by Prof. F. W. Ellis, who declared it had never been on a better basis for usefulness and growth. Each of the academies reported hopeful conditions and outlook. Secretaries Boynton, Hood, Herrick and Whittlesey spoke convincingly for their societies; Dr. Roy's "jubilee service," with workers from the field, captured the audience; and Secretary Hitchcock's words found special timeliness in the discussion of the theme, The Responsibility of the Church for the Conversion of the World. It was universally regretted that no secretary of the C. H. M. S. could attend the association this year.

On Sunday Sec. G. M. Boynton preached on Christian Fellowship. In the afternoon the rarely precious home missionary experience meeting, the tender communion season, at which twenty-six persons were received to membership by the pastor, Dr. Cordley, and the stirring missionary meeting in the evening warmed our hearts and sent us on our way with happiest memories of the General Association of 1896.

The woman's missionary meetings, held for two days just prior to the association, deserve a more extended notice than space here allows. They were marked by encouraging reports of progress, intelligent discussion of missionary problems, deep spirituality, and the cheering presence and words of Miss Mary P. Wright, who went from Kansas to the foreign field. L P B.

CONFERENCES AND ASSOCIATIONS.

MASS.—The Essex South Conference met at Hamilton, May 13. The topics were: The Restoration of Family Worship, The Sunday School as a Social, Educational and Spiritual Force, America's Great Revivals; Their Differences and Seasons. The History of Essex South Conference, by Rev. T. F. Waters, will be published. The churches were shown to be in a flourishing condition, several having received large additions in membership.

Worcester Central Conference met at Princeton May 12. The themes were: Oriental Opportunities, God's Providence and Man's Response, The Efficacy of Prayer, Adult Derelicts and the Sunday School, The Bible and the Christian Endeavor Society. Miss Leitch's stirring appeal for the Eastern Turkey Mission met with a hearty response, over $600 being subscribed. The report of the churches showed increased benevolences and gains in all lines of church activity.

The North Berkshire Conference met in Williamstown, May 13. The topics were: The Church Exalting the Home, Close Relations of Sister Churches, The Needs of the Sunday Evening Service, Qualifications for Church Membership.

The East Hampshire Conference met last in Greenwich with an attendance larger than usual. The topics were: The Value of the Prayer Meeting to the Church, The Great Needs of the Church. Rev. Oliver Huckel preached.

At the Worcester North Conference in Athol, May 12, 13, topics were: The A. M. A., The C. H. M. S, The Midweek Prayer Meeting, Dangers of Worldliness Among Christians. Rev. G. B. Kambour preached the sermon.

CT.—The New London County annual conference was entertained by the Broadway Church, Norwich, and rejoiced in the largest attendance in its 34 years' existence. The retiring moderator, Dr. W. S. Palmer, preached a practical sermon. Reports were given by nearly all the churches. Excellent addresses were given by Secretary Woodbury of the A. M. A. and Prof. Williston Walker of Hartford Seminary on The Value of a Knowledge of Congregationalism to Our Churches, and How to Secure It.

MINN.—Owatonna Conference met at Waterville, May 12-14, with a large attendance of pastors. Topics were: The Mission of the Church in Its Vicinage; Organization for Service; The Pulpit as Seen from the Pew; The Pew as Seen from the Pulpit; Christian Citizenship; The Rescue of the Sabbath; Missionary Extension; Evangelistic Endeavor; How to Interest Men in Church Work; Fellowship Meetings. A symposium on benevolence, followed by a discussion upon an annual offering for each of the benevolent societies from every church, was of much interest. The annual sermon was preached by Rev. Mrs. H. M. Mullenix. Considerable time was given to home missions and an earnest appeal made for funds for new work in northern Minnesota. The women's meetings were interesting and well attended. One or two churches reported revivals of great power.

IO.—The Northeastern Association, meeting at Decorah, May 12-15, opened with the associational sermon by Rev. V. B. Hill. All the missionary societies had a hearing. Other topics were: The Millstone of Christianity, Church Fellowship, The Minister's Study, The Importance of Preaching in Congregational Churches, and Business Methods in Church Work.

NEB.—Lincoln Association met at Ashland, May 10-12, Dr. Lewis Gregory preaching the sermon, which reviewed the work within the bounds of the association during the past 25 years. Among the topics were: The Ideal Prayer Meeting, The New Revivalism, Breadth of Missionary Interest, The Church and Temperance, The Purpose of the Church. The afternoon and evening of the closing day were devoted to Sunday school and Endeavor work. A resolution was passed deprecating efforts to organize another college in the State. After the regular services the association was invited to participate in a banquet which closed the celebration of the 25th anniversary of the Ashland church. Addresses were made by "Father" Dresser, a worker in the State for the past 27 years, by President Perry and others.

S. D.—The spring meeting of the Black Hills Association was held at Hot Springs, May 12, 13. Rev. T. W. C. Cheeseman preached the sermon. Among the subjects considered were: Institutional Churches, Gambling, Was Jesus a Socialist? and The Dropping of Delinquent Church Members.

WN.—Northwestern (formerly Seattle) Association met with the Edgewater Church, Seattle, and was largely attended. The sermon was by Rev. W. H. G Temple. The general theme was The Church and the People; and such questions as urch and Prayer Meeting Attendance, The Church d the Times, Industrial, Political and Municipal form, and the Submerged Classes were discussed th great interest. The work of the several benev- nt societies was considered. Five churches were ceived into the association, and other communi- s were reported as ready for organization. W. L. wson and J. W. Hard were approbated to preach d J. J. Tompkins, who is conducting services in lated communities as a lay preacher, was ap- oved to continue in such work.

ORE.—The Willamette Association met at Albany, ril 28, 29, Rev. J. W. Cowan, D. D , preaching the rmon. The themes were: The Holy Spirit, The ngdom of God, Missions. The Outlook for the ngdom, The Sunday School and the Kingdom, My ace in the Kingdom, Education and the King- m, The Holy Spirit and Missions, and The Conse- ated Man the Instrument of the Holy Spirit, were e principal papers. Encouraging reports were ade by a large majority of the churches. Mis- ons, home and foreign, were represented. The vision of the association into smaller districts, hich has been under discussion for three years, as accomplished after a prolonged and spirited bate. The new local associations will be Colum- a, containing 10 churches; East Side with 14; est Side with 13; Southern with nine; and Mid- olumbia with nine. Willamette Association has creased from eight churches and 821 members in 36 to 48 churches and 3,183 members.

NEW ENGLAND.

Boston.

What Training Are the Churches Demanding for heir Pastors? was the question under considera- on at the Ministers' Meeting Monday morning. r. W. H. Bolster read a paper printed last year in he Word and Work, in which he emphasized ree important points in which he believes the urches demand a minister to be well trained: The practical administration and businesslike anagement of the spiritual forces of the church. The true spirit and principles of "Christian orldliness." 3. A vital, or ethical, rather than a overnmental or imperial theology. This paper as followed by a bright discussion in which it was ade evident that in the judgment of the minis- rs present, at least, strong common sense was a ost necessary portion of the equipment of a use- l pastor.

Old South. Rev. George Adam Smith, D. D., Free Church College, Glasgow, will occupy the ulpit next Sunday morning and evening, May 24.

Berkeley Temple. The continued services of the econd anniversary of the School of Applied Chris- anity were held during last week, May 12-14, the ublic exercises on the English Bible and Christian hics occurring on the first two days, with a re- eption to the school by the church on the latter, nd the graduating exercises taking place May 14. he afternoon was devoted to the graduates, seven number, who read essays on The Christian Worker nd Social Problems, What Christianity Has Done or Woman, The Kingdom of God, "The Silent artner," Home Ministration, The Mission of the hristian Worker and The Modern Hand-Book. In he evening Dr. C. L. Thompson of New York gave n address on Christianity Applied, Dr. C. A. Dick- son spoke briefly and Rev. Lawrence Phelps, the rincipal, presented the diplomas.

DORCHESTER.—Pilgrim. A new organ, to cost ver $4,000, is to be put in place during the pastor's acation this summer.

BRIGHTON.—Dr. A. A. Berle preached his fifth nniversary sermon as pastor last Sunday on The reacher of Today.

Massachusetts.

SALEM.—South. The church has sustained a seri- ous loss in the death of Amos Johnson, M. D., who was for many years a deacon and efficient and gen- erous worker. He had held important offices here, was an ex-president of the Congregational Club and was connected with many other important bodies.

ROCKPORT.—First. Rev. Israel Ainsworth has preached his fifth anniversary sermon after a period of specially successful labor. The number of acces- sions have been larger than during the first five years of any other pastorate, and the membership is larger than for 12 years previous. All the organ- izations are in excellent order.

LOWELL.—John Street. Rev. G. H. Johnson com- pleted four years of service with this church last Sunday. During this period 50 persons have united with the church and a payment of $950 has been made on the church debt. The church is facing the problem of the down-town church with patient per- sistence in the work of the gospel.——First. Rev. G. F. Kenngott has been chosen to preach the memorial sermon before the three Posts of the Grand Army.

NEEDHAM.—First. Ten persons were added to the church, Rev. A. S. Walker, D. D., pastor, May 3, making an even 100 accessions during the last 10 months. The remarkable interest which has prevailed during the past winter is a fresh illus- tration of what may be expected from a united praying people and the earnest preaching of the gospel with God's blessing upon it.

WORCESTER.—Pilgrim observed the 13th anni- versary of its Sunday school, May 10, as "100 per cent. day." The attendance was 664, the largest in the history of the school, and lacked but 14 of the total enrollment.——Norwegian holds its meetings in the Summer Street chapel.

RUTLAND.—This church is in quite a flourishing condition. Eight persons have been added since Jan 1, seven on confession. Two were received at the May communion. The present membership is 201. The amount given for benevolence last year was about $200. The Sunday evening service is a general conference meeting. The Y. P. S. C. E. has about 70 members. Rev. Sidney Crawford is pas- tor.

BARRE.—The largest amount of regular contribu- tions ever given by this church for benevolent pur- poses was given last year—$840. There have been nine additions since Jan. 1, three on confession. The present membership is 170. The Y. P. S. C. E. and Sunday school are both in good condition and doing good work. Rev. J. F. Gaylord is pastor.

WARREN.—A recent report shows an increase in Sunday school attendance of 25 per cent. over last year. Five new members were received into the church at the last communion. The Y. P. S. C. E. has given $25 as a special gift to the American Board to continue for another year the work of a native preacher in India whose labors were to close on account of retrenchment. Rev. H. G. Hale is pastor.

WARE.—East. The Men's League was organized in March and has been successful thus far. The evening congregations have doubled, making the average for the past six weeks 400. The various or- ganizations are flourishing. The contributions for benevolences last year were $4,050. Rev. A. B. Bas- set is pastor.

NORTHAMPTON.—First. The annual reports show a membership of 369, of whom 12 were received last year, four on confession. The various benevo- lent societies handed over $2,432 which were ap- propriated to a number of worthy causes outside the gifts to the regular societies.

SPRINGFIELD.—First. The repairs on the meet- ing house are to be more extensive than was at first anticipated. Much of the present interior was probably put up when the house was built, 77 years ago, and still remains firm. Steel cannot now be satisfactorily used and so the dome form will be retained to preserve the colonial character and acoustic properties of the interior. The repairs will occupy seven or eight weeks. Meanwhile the Court Square Theater services are attracting large congregations. An orchestra and chorus lead the singing.——Hope. The Boys' Brigade finished its season May 15 with an exhibition and competitive drill, followed by a social. The boys have done good work under military and religious instructors, and the organization has attracted much attention. ——Park. Rev. A. E. Cross, formerly of Clifton- dale, began his pastorate last Sunday. He is a graduate of Phillips Academy, Amherst College and Andover Seminary, and has studied abroad at Oxford. The people are unanimous in receiving him.——Eastern Avenue. Prof. P. H. Buechler of Boston is now holding a week of music with this church. Classes in hymn singing are held every evening for adults and in the afternoon for chil- dren. Professor Buechler is a graduate of two musical universities in Germany and came to this country as the leader of a large orchestra. Since his conversion he has devoted his whole time to the improvement of church music. He is a special in- structor in music at the International Y. M. C. A. training school.

Maine.

BANGOR.—Hammond Street has been presented with a set of individual communion cups, the gift of Mrs. H. A. Daggett in memory of her husband, the late J. M Daggett, a beloved officer of the church for many years. The pastor, Rev. H. L. Griffin, made the presentation for the donor and Deacon E. F. Duren received the gift for the church. Deacon Duren and his wife will celebrate the 60th anniversary of their marriage May 30.

HIRAM AND SEBAGO.—These churches, six miles apart, have been greatly blessed the past year in the ministry of Mr. G. P. Merrett, who soon leaves them to enter college. Secretary Hatch assisted, May 3, in receiving to the Sebago church 16 adult members. In the afternoon a similar service was held at Hiram where no members had been received for some years, but 12 joined at this time.

FRYEBURG.—The annual meeting of the church was held May 1. The pastor, Rev. C. S. Young, closes his labors May 10 after a successful and ac- ceptable pastorate. He has now purchased a farm. The church is prosperous, harmonious and free from debt.

PHILLIPS.—Rev. W. W. Ranney has preached his farewell sermon, much to the regret of the church and the community. He has ministered faithfully and successfully here four years.

MACHIAS.—The receipts of the May Day break- fast and entertainments of the day and evening were $110.

New Hampshire.

MONT VERNON.—The grading of the grounds about the new meeting house and parsonage was successfully accomplished May 2. By a previous arrangement 60 men and a dozen teams were on the ground for work at a seasonable hour. The value of this gratuity was nearly $200. The women as enthu- siastically supplied a feast for the volunteers. A row of handsome rock maple trees has been set out in front of the parsonage. The raising of money for a new organ is under way. The town will probably purchase the old building for a town hall.

MANCHESTER—First. The special Sunday evening services during the winter have been largely at- tended. Dr. T. E. Clapp, the pastor, has confined himself to preaching the gospel and his efforts have been a success.

EXETER.—First. The tower of the church edi- fice, which has long been leaning, has now been put into its normal position and the upper part of the belfry is undergoing needed repairs.

By a May festival the Ladies' Aid Society of South Seabrook raised $42 for the insurance of the church building.——A set of individual commun- ion cups has been lately presented to the church in Meriden by an unknown friend.

Vermont.

BETHEL.—The church has lately received a gift of $250 through the Ladies' Aid Society.

Connecticut.

MANSFIELD CENTER.—First held its annual meet- ing May 6. The financial affairs were found to be in good condition. Repairs and improvements have been made on the meeting house and parsonage. Benevolent contributions were $102. Eighteen new members have been recived into fellowship, mostly as a result of revival meetings. The field of the church covers much territory and neighborhood meetings are held under the care of the pastor in out districts. A large and well-attended C. E. Soci- ety is one of the most hopeful features. The pastor and his wife have organized a reading circle among the young people.

NEW HAVEN.—The 25th annual meeting of the branch of the Woman's Board of Missions was held in United Church Chapel May 12, 13. Among the speakers were Mrs. Judson Smith, Mrs. De Forest of Japan, Miss Webb of Turkey and Mrs. Capron of India. About 200 out of town delegates were pres- ent.——Plymouth. Since Jan. 1 the church has re- ceived 55 new members, 20 on confession. They are nearly all adults. The attendance at Sunday school has doubled, and a large mission circle has been or- ganized. The pastor is Dr. W. W. McLane.

BRANFORD.—A class of 10 young men was received into the church on confession on a recent Sunday and five other persons were received by letter. Thirteen active members have just been added to the C. E. Society and more are expected. The con- gregations are large, the spiritual life is strong and the membership is the largest in the history of the church. Dr. T. S. Devitt is pastor.

ROCKVILLE.—Rev. Mr. Hall has declined the call extended to him, delaying his answer several weeks on account of illness. The women are making preparations to raise money necessary to pay off the church debt. It is expected that the entire $6,000 will be subscribed in a short time, payable in 12 monthly payments.

WEST REDDING.—A new chapel, costing $800, was dedicated in the Umpawog district May 8. The Sunday school was organized about five years ago and now numbers 60 members. Three different denominations were represented at the dedication exercises.

MIDDLETOWN.—North. The church has been notified that it will be presented with $5,000 to establish a trust fund in memory of Miss Fannie A. Russell, the income to be used to pay for a pew, to be called the Fannie Russell pew.

The rear of the pulpit of the South Windsor church has been enlarged and changed to make room for the choir.

MIDDLE STATES.

New York.

LINCKLAEN.—The old church in this place has been in a condition of suspended animation for 13 years and the field has been occupied largely by the Methodists. In the last few months, in connection with a striking religious interest under the preaching of Rev. D. W. Bull of Pitcher, there has been a great change. The community have freely voted for Congregational services and, on the 13th, the church was reorganized with 20 members, only two belonging to the old organization. Rev. Lemuel Jones has assisted in the work. This will make four church organizations to which Mr. Bull ministers and he will have the assistance of Mr. S. R. Myers of the Middle Class of Yale Seminary for the summer.

LYSANDER.—Rev. J. L. Keedy is having a successful pastorate in several directions, one of which is of special interest: a class of children to study a catechism. Examinations are required, and as a result a number are about to unite with the church. Another catechism on church government and methods will give the young people a thorough knowledge of church life. A series of sermons on different denominations has aroused much interest.

SUMMER HILL.—The church edifice has been repaired recently at an expense of $500 and services of rededication were held May 10. The past history of the church and its present duty were subjects of papers, and the pastor, Rev. A. M. Asadoorian, and Rev. F. A. S. Storer gave addresses. The repairs and refitting were greatly needed and the contributions for them were mostly in sums from 25 cents to $5.

LOCKPORT.—East Avenue. This new organization, after feeling the hard times so severely, is taking on new life and hopefulness in the coming of Rev. W. J. Tate of Springfield, Mass. At his installation, on the 14th, a new part was introduced—the charge to the choir—which was given by Rev. J. L. Franklin of Buffalo.

MILLVILLE.—This church, without a pastor for a considerable time and much reduced in strength, has been greatly revived and its membership increased in the past year under the ministry of Rev. H. C. Keeley. He is a Western evangelist and his labors have resulted in adding to the church nearly 70 members.

THE SOUTH.

Florida.

TAMPA.—This church is prosperous. Its reading-room and institutional activity are specially successful features. The membership is increasing. A Cuban school receives aid from the church. Rev. E. P. Herrick is pastor.

The Florida Home Missionary Society has started a movement to spread the Cuban work already begun in Florida by this society to Havana in providing for a band of orphan children, to be gathered all over the island, from among those whose parents have been slain in the war.——On a recent Sunday at West Palm Beach a class of 13 adults was received into the church.——An exodus among the people in White City has necessitated the closing of the church for the present.

THE INTERIOR.

Ohio.

SPRINGFIELD.—First. Secretary W. H. Warren of the H. M. S., and former pastor here for 12 years, recently gave an exceedingly interesting account of his work in Michigan to a large audience.——Lagonda Avenue. Rev. A. E. Woodruff has taken hold of the work in this church with a strong hand and already enjoys the cordial co-operation of church and congregation.

Illinois.

ROCKEFELLER.—This church, under the lead of its efficient pastor, Rev. Isaac Cookman, has made gratifying progress during the last 20 months. A church building has been purchased and completely remodeled and a convenient parsonage has been erected. A few weeks ago it was found necessary to add to the seating capacity by placing 50 more chairs in the audience-room.

GALESBURG.—Knox Street. Rev. Arthur Miles, the pastor, is rejoicing over the results of meetings conducted by Evangelist Van Auken, assisted by Mr. John R. Bursk, singer. The cards signed number 51, and 27 persons have been received to membership.

Wisconsin.

BELOIT.—Rev. Henry Ostrom of Milwaukee, the evangelist, has just finished a short series of union services in which the First and Second Churches participated. The spirit al life has been stimulated, much personal work has been done and general interest awakened. Many cards were signed. The churches will continue their fellowship meetings longer.

THE WEST.

Iowa.

POSTVILLE.—During the four years' pastorate of Rev. L. S. Hand, which closed May 10, both meeting house and manse have been repaired and the lecture-room newly furnished. Home expenses have averaged $1,200 a year and benevolences about $600. A home department of the Bible school, a Junior C. E., two battalions of Pickets and an afternoon prayer meeting have been organized. Special revival services have been held every year, the last bringing 23 accessions at one time. Mr. Hand's work has not been confined to his own church, but he has rendered valuable service in the community and has helped several neighboring Sunday schools and C. E. societies.

ELKADER.—A church building enterprise has been undertaken, and $2,000 already have been pledged. The building is to cost about $3,000. The church is only two years of age. Rev. F. L. Fisk is pastor. Arrangements have been made for holding evangelistic services under the leadership of Evangelist Thompson of South Dakota.

THOMPSON.—This church, only a few months old, May 10 dedicated a house of worship costing about $1,000. Secretary Douglass preached the sermon. Only $40 were needed to complete payment for the building. The C. C. B. S. aids the enterprise to the amount of $200. Rev. Abi L. Nutting is pastor.

CRESCO.—The church is now under the pastoral care of Mr. O. H. Holmes, a young man from Chicago Theological Seminary. The women recently paid the last dollar of indebtedness on the parsonage, and the church in all departments is free of debt.

DECORAH.—A remarkable spirit of fellowship and co-operation is reported among the leading churches of the city.

Minnesota.

MINNEAPOLIS.—Como Avenue. Interest is growing in the Woman's Congregational Missionary Union, a characteristic organization of the city. A full meeting of this society was held May 12 and devoted to home missions. Among the topics were: The Year-Book: Does It Help Missions and How? How Do We Give, Judiciously or Impulsively? A Lesson of Christian Helpfulness from the Grecians, Lenten Readings in Congregational Churches, The Margaret Louise Home, New York City and The Girl's Village Home, Ilford, Eng.——Plymouth. A largely attended reception was given to Rev. and Mrs. D. N. Beach, May 13. Mr. Beach has already made a warm place for himself in the affections of his church, of his brother ministers and of the whole city.

EXCELSIOR.—The edifice has recently been painted, the young people furnishing the paint and two young men doing the work. The new pastor, Rev. C. L. Mears, begins work May 17, and there is a hopeful outlook for this church, the second of its order in the State.

HAMILTON.—This country church, once strong and self-supporting, is served by a Dutch Reformed clergyman of the vicinity. Interest has been awakened and a determination to live. The meeting house is undergoing repairs.

NEW YORK MILLS.—The pastor preaches at four stations, holds Bible readings and children's meetings throughout a circuit of 45 miles, conducting a service in some place nearly every evening in the week.

Nebraska.

ASHLAND.—The silver anniversary of the birth of this church was delightfully observed May 10-12, the former date beginning also the fifth year of the present pastorate under Rev. Wilson Denney. Features of the program were a valuable historical survey by Hon. H. H. Shedd, the business history of the church by the treasurer, Mr. F. H. Chickering, and other papers showing its financial and missionary record, as well as work done by the women. The celebration closed with a banquet at the opera house, when 25 silver dollars were presented to Hon. H. H. Shedd and wife in token of appreciation by the church of their long and faithful service. With the exception of the present pastor and a six months' supply the church has had but three pastors in its history, each of whom served seven years.

South Dakota.

CENTERVILLE.—Evangelists Thomson and Gamble have closed a three weeks' series of union meetings. Christians have been greatly quickened and foundations laid for future spiritual fruitage. Several persons have already been received into the church. The spirit of union among the several churches is stronger than ever before.

IROQUOIS AND OSCEOLA.—The work in this large field, in care of Rev. A. H. Robbins, is increasing in interest. Home departments have been organized in the Sunday schools, and much help is expected from this feature.

Montana.

HELENA.—The church was greatly strengthened by the reception, May 3, of 21 members, 18 on confession, Rev. Carl Kelsey's entire Sunday school class being among the number. These accessions are largely the result of union evangelistic services under the leadership of Messrs. Elliott and Butts.

GREAT FALLS.—Rev. A. J. Williamson, who has so successfully carried forward the work here for the past six months, is compelled on account of his wife's health to decline the unanimous call to the permanent pastorate. He and the church part with mutual regret.

LAUREL.—The whole community is enthusiastic in the matter of a house of worship and contributions have been generous.

PACIFIC COAST.

California.

SAN LORENZO.—Rev. L. L. Wirt has been assisting the pastor in a 10 days' meeting. Besides quickening of members there were several conversions. A neighboring pastor, Rev. F. H. Maar of Niles, showed his interest by bringing his C. E. society in a body on Sunday evening.

PALERMO.—At a council held April 28 Mrs. Alice M. Robinson was ordained as an evangelist. She is at present serving the church at Wyandotte, six miles from Palermo.

Oregon.

PORTLAND.—Mississippi Avenue. A house to house canvass is being made in the parish to find those who do not attend any church or Sunday school. This measure has revealed a few indigent families whose wants have been supplied. A number of Catholic families permit their children to attend this Sunday school. Two Catholics united with the church recently.——Sunnyside. A Boys' Brigade, organized two months ago, now has 50 members who, by the Christian influences thrown around them, have been transformed from an ungovernable lot of boys into orderly, well-behaved young men, attentive to the instruction given them and manifesting much interest in their Sunday prayer meeting.

Washington.

A parsonage is being built in Leavenworth for Rev. Jonas Bushell, who has just accepted a call to this church.——Rev. H. W. Houlding is receiving a hearty welcome as State evangelist.

CANADA.

MONTREAL.—Point St. Charles. Deep and widespread regret is felt at the resignation of Rev. Thomas Hall, the only pastor since the organization in 1891. The original membership of 30 has increased to 175, and the Sunday school, which began with three teachers and five scholars, now reports a membership of 250.

We do not sing enough, either in our homes or in the house of God. The tongue that is singing will not be scolding or slandering, or complaining or uttering nonsense. And in the house of God it is sheer robbery to seal the mouths of Christ's redeemed followers and to relegate the sacred joy of praise to the voices of half a dozen hired performers. Choirs have their use; it is their abuse that works spiritual mischief.—Dr. T. L. Cuyler.

Centennial of Congregationalism in Ohio.

The State Association and the Church History Society combined their meetings, May 12–14, at Marietta, where the first permanent settlement in Ohio was commenced April 7, 1788, the first sermon to whites in Ohio preached July 20 of the same year, and where the first governor of the Northwest Territory lived.

The First Church, where the meetings were held, was the first Congregational church organized in Ohio (Dec. 6, 1796). Its "two-horned" edifice, the oldest in use in the State, but still well preserved and beautiful, has been used continuously for church purposes since 1808. Here at the old-time "gateway of the Northwest" met representatives of the Northwest Territory, which came into the possession of the United States by the famous "ordinance of 1787," the work of the same man who was instrumental in forming the Marietta colony, Rev. Manasseh Cutler of Ipswich, Mass.

MUSKINGUM ACADEMY
The first school building in Ohio; built in 1798.

The address of welcome by President Simpson was rich and racy. President Ballantine's sermon, Matt. 23: 8–10, was a noble forth-setting of our polity as Scriptural, potential and ennobling. Organization was effected by the choice of Dr. H. M. Ladd, moderator; Rev. R. S. Lindsay, assistant; Rev. E. O. Mead, scribe; Prof. J. F. Berry, assistant.

Even a century of history could not crowd out the reports of the association's standing committees on missionary societies. A resolution was unanimously passed protesting against the arrest of the A. M. A. teachers in Florida, for teaching white and colored children in the same school, as an outrage upon the civil and religious liberty guaranteed under the Constitution, and promising the officers of the A. M. A. sympathy and support in contesting this action to the last. Resolutions were passed denouncing Turkish atrocities and calling on our Government to leave nothing undone in her power to rebuke and restrain this ferocity, also indorsing the recent Piqua Congregational Christian Conference and appointing a committee authorized to co-operate in calling further like conventions.

The enthusiasm, which kept up well during the missionary addresses, rose still higher when Dr. D. L Leonard spoke on the Foreign Missionary Work of Congregationalism. Rev. J. E. Dickinson, in his valuable paper on the Early History of Congregationalism in Ohio, noted five varieties: the Massachusetts variety, purely democratic, exemplified in the Marietta colony; the Connecticut variety, with its consociations tending toward Presbyterianism, finding its home on the Western Reserve; the Welsh variety, beginning at Paddy's Run in 1803, where preaching was in Welsh for seventy-five years but whence has gone forth many educated and useful citizens, the little community never being without representatives among college students; the anti-slavery variety, several churches originating by withdrawal from other bodies because of more pronounced views on human freedom; and the Oberlin variety, which was democratic and anti-slavery but whose peculiarity was in its views on sanctification.

Dr. James Brand took up the thread of history which Dr. Dickinson laid down and told us of the "cruel and divisive distrust springing from mutual ignorance and disposition to criticise," fostered by the "plan of union," which had allowed half a century to go by without any general and permanent organizatien, then of the numerous abortive attempts to organize a State body, finally crowned with success at Dayton in 1852, and of the influence on public affairs which the State association has exerted since it has stood above the "grave of buried prejudices."

Pres. C. F. Thwing made us all feel proud of the educational work of Congregationalism as, with easy grace, he recounted our noble succession of colleges and instructors and showed that the spirit of sacrifice which endowed Harvard with sixpences and silver spoons has been repeated in Dartmouth, Williams, Bowdoin, Hudson, Oberlin, Marietta, Wabash, Illinois, Knox, Beloit, Iowa, Olivet, Carleton, Doane, Yankton, Redfield, Colorado and Whitman, and that our educational greatness had not consisted in marble halls but in earnest students and high-minded instructors.

It were idle to attempt a single word, where many words would not suffice, to express the value of such papers as those sent by Prof. Frank H. Foster on Congregationalism Previous to 1800, and by Prof. Williston Walker, D. D., on Contributions of Congregationalism to Civic and Public Affairs, or those read by Dr. William Kincaid on The Home Missionary Work of Congregationalism and by Rev. Washington Gladden on Contributions of Congregationalism to Theological Progress.

The last paper on The Future of Congregationalism by Dr. Henry M. Ladd was most stimulating. The closing evening was given to greetings from representatives of Michigan, Illinois and Wisconsin and reminiscences by old settlers.

The association appointed a committee to co-operate with the Church History Society in securing the publication in a volume of the historical addresses of the meeting.

AN EDITORIAL VIEW OF THE OCCASION.

It was a great privilege to attend the sessions of the Ohio State Association at Marietta. It was a pleasure to meet brethren of whom one has heard so much and listen to the testimony they gave of the progress of the kingdom of God in the fields given them to cultivate. Situated in a remote corner of the State, it is not strange that the attendance should have been somewhat less than usual. Yet the attractions of Marietta and the fact that the story of a hundred years of the life of her first and still most flourishing church was to be told drew many hither in spite of the inconvenience of trains and the cost of the long journey. It is not often that one listens to a meatier program than that furnished at Marietta. The pastor, Rev. C. E. Dickinson has been at work on it for more than a year The ten papers which he had planned to have read were all that could have been desired. All were disappointed that Dr. Quint could not be present and that he could not even send his paper for some one else to read. Deep and hearty sympathy was felt for him in his recent bereavement and the hope expressed hat he may be spared many years to serve our churches.

Some features of the gathering were peculiar. The program was carried out to the letter. Although there was no limit to the length of the papers presented no one was permitted to read more than half an hour. This cut off some in the very midst of what seemed to reader and listener alike the most interesting part of the paper. But as all the papers are to be printed in full, the loss is less than it otherwise might have been. Then there were no discussions. The only chance for brethren not on the program to talk was in the brief intervals allowed for business and in the devotional hours. The number who wanted to tell the stories of early days in the last half-hour devoted to reminiscences was an indication of what might have been enjoyed had the program been less crowded. But the meeting was designedly historical and was held strictly to the purpose for which it had been called. Dr. Ladd of Cleveland was moderator, and in the dispatch of business and the rigor with which he kept readers of papers within their time gave universal satisfaction. Ohio Congregationalism has come to self-consciousness. It is not ashamed of its history. But it lives in the present rather than in the past. It is keenly alive to present demands.

It realizes present responsibilities. It is faithful to the idea of the church and to the conversion of individuals. Through men born of God it would leaven society, while at the same time doing all it can to alleviate suffering, to right existing wrongs and to bring classes of men now opposed to each other into complete harmony. In the earnestness of the men who took part in this association, in the candor with which they presented their views, in the charity they manifested for each other and for all who differed from them, in their manifest eagerness to bring men to God rather than to win them for any particular sect, while at the same time exhibiting the utmost loyalty for the denomination they represent, there is prophecy of great accomplishments in the future.

CHRISTIAN ENDEAVOR NOTES.

A free copy of the denominational missionary magazine is sent by the C. E. Missionary League of the Reformed Church in America to each society of its denomination contributing annually not less than $10 to the denominational missionary boards.

At Scotland's convention, held in Edinburgh, the secretary's report showed an increase in the number of Scotch societies from 196 to 314. The Free Church leads the list with 70 societies, followed by the United Presbyterians and Baptists. An inspiring service was held on the spot in the Grassmarket where the martyrs suffered.

All local unions competing for the banners to be awarded at Washington should report their work to Secretary Baer by June 15. One banner each goes to the union that has done the best work in Christian citizenship, in organizing the largest number of new societies since the Boston convention and in promoting proportionate giving, i. e., having the largest number of individual members giving not less than one-tenth of their incomes.

At the Tennessee Convention, held in Union City, an important topic was The Missionary Uprising Among the Young. An open parliament was also devoted to the subject. At the closing meeting 68 persons pledged themselves to tithe giving and a large number expressed their willingness to go as foreign missionaries. The members of the societies in the State now number 12,040. There have been 470 conversions among the members during the past year and $3,784 have been given to missions.

Washington has several gospel wagons, and for the first time in a C. E. Convention use will be made of this mode of evangelization. Another new feature will be a daily Bible reading, from 8.30 to 9.30, at the New York Avenue Presbyterian Church. Early morning prayer meetings are to be held in 33 churches each morning. Two of the new chorus leaders will be Mr. Peter Bilhorn and Mr. E. O. Excell, while Mr. Sankey will also be present to assist in the music. Tent Washington will be known as the official headquarters, and the desks of Dr. Clark and Secretary Baer will be on its platform during all the sessions.

Following the preparatory meetings at Washington there will be two addresses of 30 minutes each followed by a "quiet hour." There will also be three lectures illustrated by the stereopticon. One afternoon there will be held in one of the tents a meeting in the interests of Armenia and among the speakers will be Miss M. W. Leitch and Rev. B. Fay Mills. At the same time a large number of missionaries will speak in the other tents at the session of the World's C. E. Union. Among the speakers on Christian Citizenship are Rev. R. S. McArthur, D. D., Mr. B. T. Washington, Mr. Thomas Murphy, Miss J. A. Ackerman and Rev. J. B. Morgan of Chester, Eng.

A MODERN REDACTOR.

In Public Document No. 52 of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts, the same being the eighth report of the custodian of public records, and recently issued, there is to be found an amusing account of a modern redactor of ancient documents. Says the custodian:

The following preface to a copy made in 1860 for a town within fifteen miles of Boston surpasses anything I have yet dis covered. The copyist says that, in justice to himself, he could not copy such bad spelling: "I have, therefore, corrected throughout the bad spelling of those old records and have given the words in the current, modern, true orthography, as justified by the standard authorities. Whereas the language was incoherent, indefinite and bungling, where bad grammar was used, where the style was deplorably bad, and where the true meaning was evidently not given, I have not hesitated to amend expressions so far at least as to make it correct, intelligible and decent. I have in many instances abridged the record, . . . never changing the sense, but expressing it by a more concise and transparent phraseology."

The wrong of gambling lies, therefore, not at all in the excessive indulgence in an intrinsically innocent practice, but in the surrender to chance of acts which ought to be controlled by reason alone, and decided by the will in accordance with the moral law of justice or of benevolence. That is, gambling is an attempt to act outside the moral law without appearing to act contrary to it.—Prof. W. Douglas Mackenzie.

Marriages.

The charge for marriage notices is twenty-five cents.

NOBLE—PIERCE—In Riceville, Io., at the residence of the bride's brother, Rev. L. M. Pierce, May 12, Arthur W. Noble and Laura A. Pierce. Rev. L. E. Potter of Elma, Io., assisted in the ceremony.

Sales Talk

Hood's Sarsaparilla has enjoyed public confidence and patronage from the beginning to a greater extent than was ever accorded any other proprietary medicine, because it possesses greater merit and produces greater cures than any other. These are facts easily proven, if you are interested, by asking any dealer in the United States. All advertisements of Hood's Sarsaparilla, like Hood's Sarsaparilla itself, are honest. We have never deceived the public, and this, with its superlative medicinal merit, is why the people have such an abiding confidence in it, and buy it almost to the exclusion of all other Sarsaparillas and blood purifiers.

For the Summer.

We have prepared especially for Summer Cottages a line of furniture, finished in soft ivory-white, and decorated in the old-fashioned style, with painted scenes, borders, historic sketches, etc., executed in china-blue.

This furniture is of the same interesting character as the old Plymouth clocks, high-backed rockers, hearth stools, etc., which memory associates with our grandmothers' "guest room."

In harmony with the prevailing architecture of our summer cottages, there could not be a better selection of furniture than these old reproductions of the last century. They have all the durability of mahogany, and are made and outfitted in the best manner.

Naturally they are quite inexpensive, and this week our stock is very complete.

THE BUSINESS OUTLOOK.

It cannot be said that general trade improves much. The merchant and financier are alike harassed by the refusal of McKinley, the most prominent Republican candidate for the presidential nomination, to state his attitude on the money question.

All classes of merchandise buyers are operating very conservatively, buying only in a hand-to-mouth way. The cotton, woolen and iron and steel industries show little or no change for the better. Merchants also report collections as continuing unsatisfactory. Prices of the various staples are fairly steady, but that is all. The outlook in boots and shoes is brighter and values are firmer.

Speculation on the stock exchanges continues flat, all interests evidently waiting for the Republican financial plank to be definitely determined at St. Louis. If that plank declares unequivocally for the gold standard, speculation will revive and general trade improve, but, if it is a straddle on the money question, many men are fearful of another crash in Wall Street. Bank clearings for last week decreased one and four-tenths per cent. compared with the week previous, and more than twelve per cent. as compared with the corresponding week of last year.

BIOGRAPHICAL.

REV. AMORY H. TYLER

Was born in 1824 and his early life was spent in Monson, Me. He became a Christian at eighteen under the preaching of Rev. Horatio Ilsley and resolved at once to make the ministry his lifework. He worked his way through Bangor Seminary by teaching, in which vocation he was eminently successful. Graduating August, 1854, he married Harriet A. Merrill of Saccarappa, and soon after was ordained pastor of the church in Falmouth. Other pastorates were at South Freeport, Norway, Monson and Camden, Me., and Middleton, North Weymouth and Dover, Mass. Especially rich spiritual harvests were his work at Falmouth, Monson and Camden.

About four years ago his health failed, since which time he has lived with his daughter, Mrs. C. E. Sidelinger of Roslindale, tenderly cared for by his beloved companion and children. Gradually failing he finally became entirely helpless, though the vital organs were comparatively unimpaired, and the mind as clear as in days of his vigor. Seven days before his death, which occurred May 3, his faithful and constant companion was taken from him, after one week's illness from pneumonia. The shock was too much; no more natural sleep, no more appetite; his heart was broken; still not a murmur. His whole sickness had been the incarnation of patient resignation. He was conscious to the last and the end was peace. Brief funeral services were held at Roslindale, and also at North Weymouth, where he was buried. He leaves two sons and four daughters. A loving husband, an affectionate father, a sincere friend and a faithful servant of his Master has gone to his reward.

R. A. R.

NORA PERRY

Died in Dudley, May 13, after a brief illness, at the age of fifty-five. Most of her literary career was passed in Boston, where her poems published in the Atlantic Monthly attracted favorable attention from Longfellow and other literati. But she was more successful as a prose writer, her books for girls being especially popular. As a newspaper correspondent, also, she gained a wide reputation. Several of her religious poems appeared first in the columns of The Congregationalist.

The Best.
The Rest.
The Test.

There are two kinds of sarsaparilla: The best—and the rest. The trouble is they look alike. And when the rest dress like the best who's to tell them apart? Well, "the tree is known by its fruit." That's an old test and a safe one. And the taller the tree the deeper the root. That's another test. What's the root,—the record of these sarsaparillas? The one with the deepest root is Ayer's. The one with the richest fruit: that, too, is Ayer's. Ayer's Sarsaparilla has a record of half a century of cures; a record of many medals and awards—culminating in the medal of the Chicago World's Fair, which, admitting Ayer's Sarsaparilla as the best—shut its doors against the rest. That was greater honor than the medal, to be the only Sarsaparilla admitted as an exhibit at the World's Fair. If you want to get the best sarsaparilla of your druggist, here's an infallible rule: Ask for the best and you'll get Ayer's. Ask for Ayer's and you'll get the best.

WOMAN'S BOARD PRAYER MEETING.

PILGRIM HALL, CONGREGATIONAL HOUSE, BOSTON, MAY 15.

The leader, Miss Annie C. Bridgman, treasurer of the Woman's Home Missionary Association, turned the thoughts of those present to the "life more abundantly" which all Christians could have in Christ Jesus. She took her illustration from the opening spring. All winter there has been the hidden, secret life in plant and tree which, as by a magical touch, bursts forth into the abounding life everywhere. In us there is the same life. We may have been cold and dull since last October, but in us is the life and we can have it "more abundantly."

Letters were read from Mrs. Gulick and Miss Page, an interesting account also by Mr. Gulick of the Christian burial of a little child, son of a graduate of the International Institute of San Sebastian. Mrs. Judson Smith then introduced Mrs. Dr. Wellman and little Paul, who, with Dr. Wellman, are soon to set sail for the West African Mission, a contribution of home missions from their field in Oklahoma. Mrs. Wellman spoke cheerfully of the life before her, narrating impressively the story of the Scotch lassie carrying a big baby, who, being asked if he was not heavy, replied: "Heavy? Why no, he's my brother!" Work is easy, Mrs. Wellman said, since we are all "brothers."

Three missionaries from Japan were also present: Miss Shedd, Miss Daughaday and Mrs. Rowland. Miss Daughaday writes back to her Japanese friends that she finds Christianity very much alive in this country and brings to us encouraging incidents of conversion among the Japanese. Mrs. Wolcott Calkins remembered in prayer the various interests that had been presented, after which Miss Stanwood gave a cordial invitation to the ladies present to attend the semi-annual meeting of the Woman's Board of Missions, to be held in Northampton, May 27. Miss Bridgman, whose home is in that city, heartily seconded this invitation.

GOOD CHURCH MUSIC.

Music has no moral quality; it is not good because it persuades a thief not to steal, or bad because it sets fire to the church. It is good or bad according as it fulfills its mission. The lowest grade of music is to be commended and used if it takes hold of the heart of a poor ignorant wanderer and lifts him into a longing for a better life; but the illiterate brother who exhorts those of his level with recognized effect is not therefore invited into the pulpits of cultured congregations, and the fact that a piece is valuable in the slums does not prove its value everywhere; nor does it follow that music is doing its elevating, interpreting work because a tune "goes" or "is popular," or even because it is set to good words. . . . Music whose melodies are commonplace, whose harmonies are meaningless, and whose rhythms are suggestive of the street or the dance, is not calculated to inspire a worshipful state of mind, to edify an educated congregation, or to proclaim the glory of God as revealed in his perfect gift of the art of tones to his children, even though it may attract and please the unthinking.—Dr. Henry G. Hanchett, in the Outlook.

FAITH IN GENERAL JACKSON.

Just after the death of Andrew Jackson, a iend of his met an old family servant and egan asking him a few questions about his ate master. "Do you think," he said, "that he General has gone to heaven?" "'Deed, dunno, sah; dat jis' depen's." "Depends n what?" "Jis' depen's, sah, on ef de in'al wanted to go, sah, er not," said the old arky, with supreme confidence in the Genral; "ef he wanted to go, sah, he am dah, ho'; an' ef he didn't, he ain't, sah."—New ork Post.

In the Boston Globe our amiable friend, olonel Fay, repeats a capital story told y Dr. Bolles at a late Portland church reeption of a one-time pastor of a colored hurch in that proud city by the sea and en. Samuel Fessenden, the father of the tatesman, William Pitt Fessenden. The colred people had undertaken to build a church nd General Fessenden was the largest conributor, giving $500. Dr. Bolles described he scene when the church was dedicated. Iany of the city pastors were present, and ell known men of all classes in the comunity. The colored pator was a very origial character, uneducated but eloquent and mpressive. He read the list of the conributors to the fund, and pausing before that f General Fessenden, who was a noted antilavery man, he said: "Gen. Samuel Fessenen, $500. God bless General Fessenden. Ve know that although his skin is white, he as got a black heart." The preacher never ould understand why the people laughed.—ewiston Journal.

One of the delegates told this story on himelf. At one of the hotels a colored man akes the hats of the guests as they go into he dining-room, and hands each man his hat ithout hesitation or mistake as he comes ut. "How did you know," asked the wonering delegate, "that this was my hat?" I didn't know it wuz your hat," was the uick response, "I only knows it wuz de hat ou gub me."

PHILISTINISM OUTGROWN.

Modern society in passing from the mili ant to the industrial type, and in displacng its oligarchic constitution for a demoratic one, went through a period of Philisinism. This Philistinism, based on crude heorizing and inadequate information, was narked by contempt for the institutions of he past and an exultant self-confidence due o lack of historical perspective. Signs are ot wanting that in America, in some repects at least, this Philistinism is being utgrown. A warm and healthy idealism s stealing over a large portion of the Amerian people. They are turning to historical tudies, to art, literature and philosophy, as ever people turned before. Their sacrifices or education and philanthropy have long ince surpassed in amount the treasures of ings and emperors. The conviction that ivilization is continuous and that the pres nt, changed though it be, is deeply rooted n the past is no longer confined to scholars, ut has become the common property of ntelligent people. From this has sprung a ew support for higher education, and for istorical and scientific research, that is a appy augury for the century so soon to pen.—Nicholas Murray Butler.

FOR AGED MINISTERS AND MINISTERS' WIDOWS.

The Board of Ministerial Aid was established in 1868 by the General Association of the Congregational churches and ministers of Massachusetts, which selected the first members and directed them to become incorporate. From that time the board has gone on in its unobtrusive but sacred work specified above. Hon. Charles T. Russell was its president from 1868 until his lamented decease a few months since, and gave not only his warm interest but his legal advice—a work which is now continued by his nephew, Arthur H. Russell. Mr. Arthur G. Stanwood, 701 Sears Building, Boston, is treasurer, and Mr. A. C. Farley of Farley, Harvey & Co. is secretary and auditor. The board has now a permanent fund, from various legacies, of about $30,000, but it has to rely upon contributions from the churches. Some churches have a rule which sends to the board annually one communion contribution, that of March, for example. If the 589 Congregational churches in our State would all take this fitting course, the income would be ample. Other churches place the board on the regular list of annual contributions.

The board is able to appropriate to widows from $100 to $150 each, with an excess sometimes in cases of young children left helpless. At the present time no widow whose case comes to our knowledge is left without help. From $100 to $200 is appropriated to aged and disabled ministers, and when a helpless couple remains a larger appropriation is exceptionally made. Indeed, some years ago a home was found in a Christian family for a very aged minister, entirely dependent and helpless, for which the board paid $300. But the godly man soon went to his Father's house. It is proper for this committee to say that sometimes members of the board have made special donations when need was urgent.

The treasurer always announces in his annual report, "Expenses—none." This means not only that he gives his well-known financial skill, but that no member of the board ever takes from the sacred fund a single cent for postage, circulars, or anything else. Nor does The Congregationalist ever make any charge for the use of its columns. Of course, the personal interest of the committee in the discharge of its delicate duties means much more of sympathy with the Master's troubled servants than is involved in financial appropriations.

The board wants more money, that is, aged ministers and widows, whose often sad and touching stories we cannot make public, need more money. We feel compelled to call special attention to the fact that this board, established by the Congregational churches of the State, is the only one acting as their agent, and the only one which as such is authorized to appeal to the churches for their benefactions.

The easiest cleaning is with Pearline.

Yes, easiest for everybody. Whether you're doing the hard work of house-cleaning yourself, or having it done, get Pearline and get through with it. It'll do more work, better work, quicker work, than anything else. You ought to look out for the wear and tear in house-cleaning as well as in washing. Some of your delicate things won't stand much rubbing. They're meant, especially, to be cleaned with Pearline. 482

BUFFALO LITHIA WATER IN NERVOUS INDIGESTION.

Rev. R. A. GOODWIN, of the Diocese of Virginia, Richmond, Va.: "I have made use [of] BUFFALO LITHIA WATER Spring No. 2 for Indigestion and Nervous Prostration with the happiest results. It has increased, in a marked degree, both my appetite and digestive powers, and invigorated my general health. When suffering great Nervous Prostration, the result of over mental labor, I have found it a prompt and wonderful restorative, and I regard it as invaluable to the brain-worker.

Rev. R. T. VANN, D. D., of the North Carolina Association: "With my digestive organs so enfeebled that the lightest articles of diet occasioned me frequently great uneasiness and at times distress, and with my NERVOUS SYSTEM impaired, I visited the BUFFALO LITHIA WATER SPRINGS of Virginia, finding the action of the water, SPRING NO. 2, all that I could have asked for. I found myself soon the possessor of a good appetite and healthful digestion. My NERVOUS SYSTEM was invigorated and my general health restored. I could not too strongly recommend this water to sufferers from DYSPEPTIC and NERVOUS troubles."

This Water is for sale by druggists, generally, or in cases of one dozen half-gallon bottles, $5.00 f. o. b. at the Springs. Descriptive pamphlets sent free to any address. Springs open for guests from June 15th to October 1st.

THE BATTLE FLAGS

ALL down the gay, applauding street,
There sounds the tramp of marching feet,
The beat of drums, the trumpets' blare,
Borne far upon the scented air,
With buoyant tread, the young and bright
Wave spotless banners in the light,
We cheer them as they march along,
Our happy, hopeful, boyish throng!

Still, far adown the bannered way,
Come sounds of measured, martial lay.
Now, with our flowers we mingle rue
For dear gray-headed "boys in blue,"
Who march with slow and solemn tread,
Their tattered banners proudly spread.
But cheer? We cannot, now, for tears;
Tears hot with memories of years!

Fair youth is beautiful and bright,
Long may its banners float in light!
We smile, and with our blessings greet
The elastic tread of hopeful feet.
But—dear old flags, the tried and true,
Upborne by ranks in dingy blue—
We love your folds, so sadly marred;
We bow to men by battle scarred!

O! to the Old Flags, torn and stained,
That floated, once, where bullets rained;
Still guarded by these honored bands,
And carried tenderly, in hands
That loving as a mother's are,
Erst strong in Freedom's noble war;
To them let all hearts lowly bow;
To them bare every manly brow!

IF emphasis was laid with reason on one point more than on another at the Fall River State meeting last week it was on the lack of fellowship among our churches. The criticism is not new, but its bearing on the State association has an added significance with reference to the enlarged representation which has been made a possibility for two years by the appointment of lay delegates. The ministers are not blamable, perhaps, for the absence of their lay members, but they should individually bear their own responsibility even more conspicuously and thus, if possible, create an influence among their people which will avert a repetition of this year's scant representation—barely 225 out of a possible 1,200 or more. We did not go to Fall River solely to hear Congregationalism praised by members of our own and other denominations. We heard that and we also heard the looseness of our interchurch relations described in such portentous terms as "ecclesiastical suicide." The next meeting will be in the central city of the State, and with that condition will serve as a more satisfactory test of the fraternal warmth of the Massachusetts churches.

Boston sees during the year a large number of notable processions, but seldom has one more distinctive in character taken possession of its streets than the long file of former students of the English High School, who came from near and from far last week to celebrate its seventy-fifth anniversary. The older classes included many men prominent in the business and professional circles of the city, while the hold which this excellent public school still has upon the rising generation was attested by the overflowing enthusiasm of the younger men. Such a reunion as this is of great value to any high school. It becomes a striking object lesson of the way in which the American free educational system unifies the heterogeneous elements of our population and infuses them with common sympathies.

The Presbyterian General Assembly, which convened at Saratoga last week, was opened with a sermon by the retiring moderator, Dr. Booth of New York, which was a plea for unity and loyalty with express reference to recent controversies. It proceeded to elect Dr. Withrow of Chicago moderator after a nominating speech in which he was pledged to the conservative positions and to hearty support of the recent legislation of the assemblies. This choice is a compliment to Congregationalism and especially to Park Street Church, Boston, of which Dr. Withrow is still a member in good and regular standing. He was supported by the liberals in spite of the pre-committal to conservatism in preference to other candidates whose record was more conservative than his own. The legislation of the assembly is largely directed by committees, and these have been chosen of conservative material, as was perhaps inevitable. The most important action up to the time of writing has been the practical settlement of the question of the relation of the Christian Endeavor Societies to the church adversely to the establishment of a denominational society. The questions of assembly control of presbyteries and seminaries has yet to come up for discussion and settlement, and developments point to a hot debate and possible defeat of the movement toward centralization. It is evident, however, that theologically the conservatives are still in a large majority. Dr. Withrow's sermon on Sunday followed and extended the lines of the retiring moderator's plea for an adjustment of existing disagreements.

One of the sanest things the church can do to counteract the temptation to indulge in bicycling for pleasure on Sunday is to hasten as far as it can a wise and universal use of Saturday afternoon as a time for recreation and rest. Then, this having been gained, another step may be taken by doing so much as is possible to imitate the British clergymen—see Current Thought, quotation from the British Weekly—and the few American clergymen who have set apart Saturday afternoon for cycling and leading their flock out into the country, on wheels. Two Presbyterian clergymen, one in Plainfield, N. J., and the other in Evanston, Ill., have done this with much advantage to all concerned, whether viewed from the standpoint of physical betterment, social delight or a strengthening of the ties between the pastor and his people, to say nothing about making it quite certain that those who ride on Saturday afternoon will sit in the pews on Sunday.

The election of Chaplain C. C. McCabe and Earl Cranston as bishops of the Methodist Episcopal Church, the former being elevated from the position of a secretary of the Board of Missions and the latter from agent of the Western Book Concern, gives to the denomination two men of sturdy individuality and marked gifts as organizers, but whether it adds to the episcopal bench men who can best serve the clergy and churches as sympathetic arbiters of their destiny remains to be seen, while their elevation—not from the ministry, but from the ranks of the lesser officials—intensifies the belief—expressed and latent—that the only way to become a bishop is to be a successful secretary or Book Concern agent. There are Methodists who feel that, should such a belief ever be justified by facts, a day of peril for the denomination would have dawned. Dr. J. M. Buckley's almost unanimous re-election as editor of The Christian Advocate and the extraordinary enthusiasm which followed the announcement of his re election prove that his splendid service as a leader on debate during this conference has not been overlooked by his fellow-delegates. A reading of the report of the committee on episcopacy, which he made and defended most sagaciously and courageously, compels us to revise the opinion ventured last week respecting the harshness of the method adopted in retiring Bishops Foster and Bowman from the list of efficient bishops. It is difficult to see how what was done could have been done more considerately, and the action of the conference is heartily indorsed by most of the denominational journals. The attempt of the more progressive Methodists to revise the Discipline, so that the position of the denomination toward amusements would be less hostile and mandatory, has proved futile. On the other hand, an attempt to add to the Discipline, so that members disregarding the Discipline and indulging in theater-going, dancing, etc., might be expelled from the church, has failed to carry.

Recent utterances called out by some of President Cleveland's vetoes of private pension bills, and an allusion by President Eliot of Harvard to the Grand Army of the Republic, do not make pleasant reading as we draw near Memorial Day. For instance, a New England congressman writes of the President of the United States, "I wish for the remainder of his life he might receive such treatment and rations as our soldiers had at Andersonville." This uncharitable wish he prefaces by saying that he makes it "in a Christian spirit"! But what has such a wish to do with the question whether a soldier's widow, who had twenty-seven years ago married again, should have her pension restored? And the Republican candidate for governor of the State of Illinois says of President Eliot, "On bended knees he should crawl within that building [Memorial Hall] in penitence, and without rising crawl out and seek the nearest pigpen and there apologize to the swine." Come, come! congressmen and candidates. Let us have an end to this sort of talk. Honor to the dead and respect for the living soldiers of the republic cannot be helped in this fashion. In our judgment President Eliot's words in reference to the Grand Army were too severe and indiscriminating, but gentlemen know how to be severe without indecency or imprecation and to disagree about matters of law and policy with Christian respect and charity.

We commend without reserve the report presented to the Fall River meeting of the General Association by the committee on Sunday observance. Instead of abounding in generalities and perfunctory lamentations, it is a scientific study of the actual observance of the Lord's Day throughout our commonwealth. Based on one hundred replies to specific inquiries sent to representative persons, it is a faithful portrayal of present day conditions. While it points out certain unfavorable tendencies, it leaves the impression that Sunday is far from becoming like the other days of the week. So far as cessation of work and a general disposition to maintain salutary protective laws go the replies are encouraging. They admit, however, that bicycles, electric cars, social calls and Sunday newspapers tend in the main to pull down desirable barriers, diminish attendance upon church and to secularize the day. On the other hand, public amusements, Sunday labor and the regular running of trains are not, as yet, and are not likely to be, established features of Sunday. Moreover, counteracting influences, such as that exerted by the New England Sunday Protective League, by more frequent references to the subject in the pulpit and by an aroused and educated public opinion are at work. These can be made far more influential if individual Christians maintain a high and consistent standard.

"WHEN WOODS ARE GREEN."

It has been said that Memorial Day threatens to go the way of all other holidays in America—the way of forgetfulness of its higher meaning in its use as a time of amusement, with all the excitement of games and excursions, which gives some foreigners the notion that Americans do not know how to have a good time quietly.

Such a view is superficial and incomplete. There are those who cannot have a good time without making it a noisy time, but there are others, and these are a majority, whose enjoyments take them away from crowds. Nor would the dead wish the living to spend their whole time in visiting and decorating graves and listening to memorial addresses, which, by the way, are apt to have a certain sameness from year to year.

It is the peculiar good fortune of the day that it mingles remembrance with anticipation, joining the thought of self-sacrifice which is ended with that of the beauty of a world which, in the season's changing round, has just come to its strength and is pushing on toward fruit-bearing. Memory of the dead alone is barren, but, transfusing and making sacred the duties and enjoyments of the present and the future, it is fruitful and uplifting. Therefore we bring flowers out of the living wealth of nature that we may remember those whose work on earth is done, who have gone forward, as we hope, to the larger opportunity of another life.

And what an exquisite point of growth and beauty it is which the day affords us leisure to enjoy! Spring is hurrying to complete her task and summer is just getting ready to take possession. The lilacs have faded slowly to their tips and their exquisite perfume must be a memory until another May distills it anew for our pleasure. The apple blossoms are gone, all but a belated branch or a tree of the deliberate and tardy Northern Spy in some sheltered corner. The wood depths are in full dress of that tender green which is so restful to the eyes, and the sunlight comes to break the dim wood shadows through ever lessening gaps as the branches lengthen and the new leaves grow. In the North the hobble-bush, as in the South the cornel, has spread and is withdrawing its white sepals which hung like drifts of snow suspended midway between forest roof and floor. Along wild roadsides in East and West the mandrake hides its waxen blossoms and growing fruit under its broad pagoda-like leaves, and in the woods where they hide in the earlier days of spring the lady's slippers push up through the brown carpet of the forest floor and spread their green leaves to the light and lift their pink-hooded cups, and the purple orchis is in blossom on the woody hills it loves. The birds of the North have gone on toward their far nesting places, but our own many-colored and sweet-tongued summer neighbors are congratulating themselves that their prescience has been justified by the growth of leaf and twig and grass about their now well-hidden nests. The oriole has begun to weave his hanging cradle and the hermit thrush sings his most ethereal strain at morn and eve from the maple spray to his brooding mate on the hidden nest.

Such is the world of the woods and hills, to visit which the day gives opportunity; and in such surroundings we may think of the consecrated lives which have preceded and enriched us, by nature's law in leaf and fallen trunk and broken bough that made the deep mold from which the forest grows, and by man's self-sacrifice for the service of his fellowman in the heroes of our nation's conflicts, and may feel that for us also there is a self-dedication, though it may be only in the quiet ways of peace. And so the faded glory of the past and the beauty and delight of the present may point us forward to a happier future in whose consummation we, too, shall have had our part.

POWER THROUGH IMPERFECTION.

The power of God never shows to more advantage than in his use of weak instruments for mighty works. The whole history of his kingdom viewed upon one side is the history of the men who were the means of its upbuilding. The writer of the epistle to the Hebrews feels this as a necessary part of the record, and voices it in the roll-call of triumphant faith. He is not content with saying that "out of weakness they were made strong," but he emphasizes his sense of the imperfection and evolution of the whole past history in the very climax of his argument: "And these all having received a good report through faith received not the promise." They were weak but necessary instruments, and their faith is the glory of the church, but in none of them was the work of God brought to perfection.

In our day, also, God is working great results through faith by means of feeble and imperfect instruments. Men are still weak and fallible; the organizations through which they work are confessedly only approximations to the ideals which have been formed of church government. Truth is not yet fully known, conduct not yet so clearly distinguished that all consciences are agreed in recognizing duty; the very record-book of God's revelation and of the progress of his kingdom, with all its glorious triumphs as the instrument of God's Spirit, has come down to us marked with the variations of old copyists, and, in the opinion of many, if not most, of the students who have given their lives to its elucidation, showing in its very texture abundant evidences of human frailty, ignorance and the exaggerations of racial pride.

It is God's glory to accomplish his work by messengers of his own choosing, and he often hides the meaning of his ways from his own people. Some may have made too much of the imperfections of the Bible, but others assuredly have refused to see them lest they should lose what faith they had. Shall we on that account attempt to exclude either party from the number of Christ's followers? That is a matter to be decided by Christ himself on far other grounds than their opinion of the "higher criticism," but, looking at the matter from our own point of view, it is well to remember that the middle ground today is not the middle ground of even a generation ago. There is an unreasonable exclusiveness of narrow belief as well as an inconsiderate inclusiveness of careless liberality, and it is possible to be more concerned for God's honor in the study of the methods of his work than he has ever cared to be.

One of our contemporaries, for example, quotes with sincere belief and marked emphasis the words of Spurgeon in regard to the Bible: "I do not believe that from one cover to the other there is any mistake in it of any sort whatever, either upon natural or physical science, or upon history or anything whatever. I am prepared to believe whatever it says, and to take it believing it to be the word of God; for if it is not all true it is not worth one solitary penny to me. It may be to the man who is so wise that he can pick out the true from the false, but I am such a fool that I could not do that. If I do not have a guide here that is infallible I would as soon guide myself, for I shall have to be correcting the blunders of my guide continually, but I am not qualified to do that, and so I am worse off than if I had not any guide at all."

Here is blind and undiscriminating praise of a book—God's book—and not one word of faith in the living Spirit of God through whom alone the letter that killeth becomes able to give men life. Have those who quote such words with approbation never learned of the false and contradictory doctrines and practices which have been preached from and justified by the words of the Bible? Have they forgotten what one apostle said of the writings of another, "Things hard to be understood, which they that are unlearned and unstable wrest, as they do also the other Scriptures, unto their own destruction"? The lesson of the time is not that the Bible must perish, or that it must cease to be the sword of the Spirit, but that it must be wielded by the Spirit. Spurgeon really found his "infallible guide" in the Holy Spirit by whose aid he used the Bible, but there is no promise for any man of perfection of knowledge. There is enough for salvation and for service, enough to serve one's own generation and advance the progress of the truth, but now it is through a glass, darkly, and only then face to face.

There is room in the churches, as there has always been, for those who accept the narrowest theory of verbal and plenary inspiration. No one has the least idea of limiting their freedom of belief or argument. But shall there be no room for other followers of Christ who have learned to see how he accomplishes his purposes through imperfect instruments and by slow advances gradually uplifting the thoughts of men as his own plans unfold?

Suppose it were true that the results of the higher criticism represented only a passing phase of thought, and that all the conclusions which have given such offense are to be corrected by a new generation of scholars working gradually back to the old position. Are we in the meantime to assure a whole generation of young men that God is impotent for their salvation and direction if in the Bible "there is any mistake . . . of any sort whatever, either upon natural or physical science, or upon history or anything whatever?" That would be to make infidels by wholesale in our colleges and to put the study of the Bible into the hands of unbelieving scholars. We dare not so limit the Holy Spirit in our thought or creed. Good angels must laugh and grieve at such lack of faith in God's care for his own work. Truth is mighty and will prevail, and He who inspired the prophets can still apply the prophecies to man's need. The citadel of faith is not here, it is in the personal relation to Christ through the indwelling of the living Spirit. He is most concerned in the perfection or imperfection of the Bible, and may be trusted to vindicate the wisdom of his ways with man in his own fashion. And to say that he who has used imperfect men as his instruments from the beginning cannot use the Book unless it is wholly free from error is to reduce the whole argument to an absurdity.

WHAT THE PRESBYTERIAN MINISTRY REQUIRES.

Mr. Vrooman's letter, printed in another column, and relating to the agitation in Chicago over his application for recognition in the Presbyterian Church, is what the lawyers call a plea of "confession and avoidance." We have no desire to reflect upon Mr. Vrooman's motives, but we have a great desire to hinder our Congregational ministers and students from seeking to enter the Presbyterian Church without carefully reading the Confession of Faith and Form of Government to which they will be expected to consent and subscribe. To do so is not prudent, because it subjects the candidate to the sort of treatment which Mr. Vrooman has received and which leaves him for a year at least with a Presbyterian standing incomplete, because subject to a protest and appeal which must pass two church courts before it can be decided. It is not courteous, because it asks the denomination to receive a minister from without on a different basis from that established for its own members; and it is always likely to result, as it has resulted in Mr. Vrooman's case, in setting a whole presbytery by the ears and distracting its members from their legitimate work of preaching the gospel.

It can hardly be necessary to point out that the case of a Presbyterian minister who begins to doubt the essential scheme of doctrine to which he has subscribed is essentially different from that of a minister who is in doubt and seeks the opportunity to subscribe. Most presbyteries are very jealous of their right to examine and the statement of individuals to the contrary should not have weighed with Mr. Vrooman when he must have known that it was with the creed subscription that he had to deal. A parallel case would be that of a foreigner who was told that it would be easy to be naturalized in America, but found himself forced to swear allegiance to the Constitution which he had never read. We would like to see the Westminster Confession abandoned as a test of ministerial standing, for we think it is wise above what is written, but while it lasts it must be reckoned with by every one who seeks to enter the Presbyterian ministry.

Since Mr. Vrooman's letter and the above comments were in print we have received a second letter from him, in which he takes up the internal disagreements of the Presbyterian Church, and Chicago Presbytery in particular, with personal allusions and accusations which are interesting, but which do not come within our proper sphere of comment. That the liberal element of theology is strong and growing stronger in the Chicago Presbytery we are glad to know, but the battle must be fought out by the Presbyterians themselves; we cannot think it wise for outsiders to enter in disregard of existing standards of belief. Mr. Vrooman's informant in the matter of examination seems to have been culpably ignorant of the usages of his own presbytery, forgetting (as Mr. Vrooman writes us) that a rule had been adopted only two or three years ago, requiring examination, which up to that time had not always been insisted on. We have refused from the first to criticise Mr. Vrooman's motives or theological opinions, but have only wished to point out that Presbyterianism must reform its own standards in its own way, and must be expected to insist upon them while they last.

KEEPING THE LORD'S DAY.

The Lord's Day, as its name implies, commemorates Jesus Christ. It reminds us of his resurrection. It is to the Christian what the Sabbath was to the Jew, a day of rest and worship. Apparently the first Christians kept both days for a time, gradually dropping the observance of the Sabbath on Saturday, as the distinction between Judaism and Christianity became more obvious, and emphasizing that of the first day of the week. At first also it appears to have been employed to some extent in innocent social intercourse and recreation, although its sacred office always was made prominent. Many of our forefathers during the last two centuries kept it more strictly than the original disciples, but in our day there is a marked tendency to go to the other extreme and regard it merely as a day for recreation, and that, too, not always of the most becoming sort.

Christ's example contradicted the beliefs and customs of the religious leaders of his age. He occasionally disregarded what they considered the proprieties. But his example cannot be quoted fairly by modern persons who wish only to amuse themselves on Sunday. Our religious customs seldom are unreasonably strict and severe, like those of the Jews. And Christ's disregard of usage in this particular never was merely for fun or for any selfish purpose, but always for some great and good end. To learn how to keep the day we still can do no better than to study his example.

Large freedom of private judgment must be allowed, and true charity must rule our estimates and comments upon what others decide in the matter. Yet it is certain that they gravely mistake, if they do not also sin, who devote no important part of the day to religious worship. And the remainder of the day, be it devoted to rest or recreation, ought to be hallowed by a religious spirit. It ought to be a different day from every other. He who claims that he may keep the Lord's Day like any secular day because all days are the Lord's, generally is found to keep no day so that any one else would suspect him of regarding it as the Lord's.

CURRENT HISTORY.

Andover—Two Hundred and Fifty Years Old.

Nowhere, save in a New England village, for many years set apart as the seat of institutions of learning, could such a celebration as the citizens of Andover, Mass., indulged in last week be held. It had a finish, a thoroughness, a dignity and beauty of its own. While the industries of the town had adequate recognition, yet it was made clear to all who witnessed and heard that however much the cause of sound learning languished in the early days of the town and however much Andover suffered from contact with the witchcraft delusion, its glory during "these latter days" has been in its academies, its "school of the prophets," its educators and their pupils, its authors and their books and its cultured citizens, drawn thither by fountains of knowledge and wisdom. Consequently, the oration by Albert Poor, Esq., the poem by Mrs. Annie Sawyer Downs, Professor Churchill's speeches as toastmaster, Lieut.-Governor Wolcott's response to the toast, The Commonwealth of Massachusetts—not to mention other equally interesting addresses and features of the occasion—all possessed that flavor of learning and intelligent patriotism which might have been predicted. The many former pupils and ever loyal admirers of Prof. E. A. Park, who read this, will be glad to know that he had indisputable proof last week of the respect and reverence of his fellow-citizens.

Domestic Politics.

There is naught to record that indicates that any successful combination has been made, or can be made, to prevent Mr. McKinley's nomination at St. Louis, but much is being done quietly to make it certain that the platform on which he must stand will be unequivocal in its adherence to the gold standard. The delegates thus far elected by State conventions to the Democratic National Convention in Chicago are evenly divided among the gold and the silver wings of the party, but the silver faction will elect more delegates than the Administration faction in the conventions yet to be held, and the party's most astute leaders realize that the fight at Chicago is to be most bitter and is almost certain to cause a bolt, no matter which faction wins. It should be noted, also, that the Populists of the South and West are refraining from action until the decision at Chicago is announced, and it is possible, if not probable, that a victory for the Administration faction at Chicago would cause, not only a bolt of silver Democrats, but their union with the Populists and bolting Western Republicans. In short, it begins to be apparent that the issue above all others in the coming campaign is to be the question of monetary standards, and parties are in such a state of flux, ties that have hitherto held are so near the breaking point, that it is useless to attempt to forecast how many candidates there will be and who they will be. With the gold reserve again melting away rapidly as the combined result of inadequate national revenue and foreign distrust of our national sanity and health, with the degenerate Senate actually seriously discussing, and apparently in favor of, taking away from the Executive the last law upon which he can rely in an effort to save us from national repudiation and business anarchy, it is obvious that the issue cannot be faced too promptly or squarely, and the man or the party that, in such a a contest, fails to sink all questions save the impersonal and the patriotic is guilty of treason and deserves to die. The outlook is by no means bright, but if, as a result of it all, alignment on a vital issue can be secured, even though it shatter old, honored, but nearly defunct, parties, the nation will emerge triumphantly on a new era of prosperity and be thankful for the darkness that preceded the dawn.

The National Legislature.

The passage of the McCall Immigration Bill by the House, May 2, by a vote of 195 to 26, if it is indorsed by the Senate and President, as seems probable, will be generally recognized as the most important new legislation of this Congress, and a landmark in our national history; for it indicates that we have ceased to extend an indiscriminating welcome to citizens of the world, and propose hereafter to exercise the same regard for our national well-being that any sane parent does in welcoming strangers into his home. Of the several bills before it bearing on this problem the House rejected that ordering and relying on consular inspection abroad, and accepted the one fathered by the Immigration Restriction League and introduced by Congressman McCall of Massachusetts. Its important clause reads thus:

> Be it enacted, etc., That Section 1 of the act of March 3, 1891, in amendment of the immigration and contract labor acts, be and hereby is amended by adding to the classes of aliens thereby excluded from admission to the United States the following: All male persons between sixteen and sixty years old who cannot both read and write the English language or some other language. But no parent of a person now living in or hereafter admitted to this country shall be excluded because of his inability to read and write.

It is true that illiteracy may sometimes consort with virtue or industry, and this law may cause the exclusion of some emigrants who would become useful citizens and pillars of society, but no safer general principle can be accepted than that we will not longer welcome the ignorant.

The fact that the Senate spent many hours in calmly debating the bill introduced by Senator Butler of North Carolina, a Populist, prohibiting the issue of United States bonds without the consent of Congress, and persisted in discussing it even after the real animus of the bill had been exposed by patriotic Democrats like Senators Gray and Hill, and Republicans like Sherman, Hawley and Lodge, is calculated to cause chills to run down the spine of any one who realizes how dependent we have been for many years upon Executive wisdom and courage in maintaining our national credit.

Highest Judicial Authority for Race Prejudice.

With all respect for the Federal Supreme Court, it is still open for us to make known our dissent from its recent decision that the State of Louisiana, exercising police power, was justified and not in conflict with the Federal Constitution when it passed a law requiring the railroads of that State to provide separate cars for white and Negro passengers. We agree with the only justice dissenting, Justice Harlan, in the opinion that no power in the land has authority to abridge civil rights along racial or caste lines, and that it would be quite as reasonable and proper for States to pass laws requiring separate cars for Catholics and Protestants, Teutons and Latins. That the Supreme Court, with a preponderance of justices born north of the Mason and Dixon line, should give its support to a prejudice which is un-American and un-Christian is disheartening and ominous. Will it declare the Sheats Law to be a just exercise of Florida's "police power"?

Reforms in Our Public Schools.

The legislature of New York at its last session made it possible for the city of New York to put an end to the alliance which has so long existed between Tammany heelers and the trustees of the public schools of the city, an alliance which has brought the public school system of the city to a depth of incompetency and inferiority which shames every high-minded citizen, not only of New York city, but of the nation of which it is the metropolis. The legislature also passed a law which gave so much authority to the one who should be selected to stand at the head of the school system of the city that it was instantly seen by the reformers that if the right man could be secured to take the place a reform could be wrought so swiftly and thoroughly that it was imperative that the opportunity should be seized, for the alternative was as dangerous as the opportunity was glorious. Therefore when last week it was announced that Pres. D. C. Gilman of Johns Hopkins University had consented to stand as a candidate for the position of superintendent of schools in New York city men first gasped with incredulity, and then rejoiced when it dawned upon them that if it were true it must mean that he considered the work one so high as to be worthy of crowning his long career as a pioneer and successful educator. But the uprising of the faculty and trustees of Johns Hopkins and the citizens of Baltimore has been such that President Gilman has announced that he must stay at Johns Hopkins. Now, while it is still open for yet another man of the same class as President Gilman to be selected to fill the place in New York, it is most important that he should be found.

The situation in Boston is deplorable. A committee of experts has decided that $300,000 should be expended immediately in putting the schoolhouses in a decent sanitary condition. The mayor of the city has recommended that this sum be appropriated immediately, and he is using all of his influence to bring this result to pass, but picayune, contemptible jealousy and partisan squabblings among the city fathers and their distrust of the school board thus far has defeated the project.

The Missionaries, Mr. Terrell and the Department of State.

Very exaggerated and untruthful reports concerning the relations between the American missionaries in Turkey and Mr. Terrell, the United States minister, and very incorrect interpretations of the import of the gathering of American citizens at the White House week before last, have been current during the past week. No formal charges against Mr. Terrell have been preferred by any one or by any body of men. The Department of State has been made aware of certain acts of Mr. Terrell which would better have been omitted; it has been made clear to President Cleveland that the delicacy of the situation in Constantinople now, and the vital questions that are soon to be adjudicated between Turkey and the United States, demand that we should have a man as minister at Constantinople who possesses tact as well as zeal, in short, one who is far more diplomatic and competent than Mr. Terrell. Mr. Terrell has been informed that for his own best interests he would better retire now when he can do so with glory rather than return and fail, and he has been assured that if he retires all possible credit will be given to him by the missionaries in Turkey and their official superiors in this country. But no charges of profanity or incompetency have been filed against him, and, if President Cleveland gives him leave to return, Mr. Terrell will have no one but himself to blame if he fails to satisfy the missionaries in Turkey, their friends in this country and public opinion.

The committee of laymen from New York, Boston and other large centers of the country, that conferred with President Cleveland and Secretary Olney respecting our future policy toward Turkey, made it apparent to these officials that they had not come to censure but to encourage, to call to mind precedents that had been established by our Department of State in the past, and to voice the feeling of Christian business men and voters that a dignified and resolute policy must be upheld in the future. On the other hand, President Cleveland made it distinctly understood that he had the utmost sympathy with the work of foreign missions in Turkey, and the firmest intention to protect missionaries there. The committee outlined a course of action which it believes should be insisted upon. Three points at least are clear. Our interests, commercial and educational, demand that we should have consulates at Harpoot, Erzroom and Marash. Prompt and full payment for indemnity of damage done to property of Americans destroyed during the past year must be demanded and secured. Proof of charges preferred against American citizens must be furnished, or the charges withdrawn and apology offered by Turkish officials.

British Politics Seething.

By resort to closure, and by forcing a twenty-two hours' session of Parliament, the British Ministry forced the Agricultural Rates Bill through its second reading last week. Sir Vernon Harcourt led a stiff but futile opposition, and the scars made in the contest will accentuate the effect upon the voters of what is so purely class legislation in the interests of the landlords that it would seem as if the ministry were mad in trying to enact such reactionary laws. The chasm between the Liberal Nonconformists and the Irish Catholics has widened as the result of a speech by John Dillon, a not over-wise and far from conciliatory comment by Mr. Gladstone, and a Nonconformist bolt from Home Rule, led by such journals as Hugh Price Hughes's Methodist Times, and The British Weekly. How intense the feeling is may be inferred by our correspondent's report of the English Congregational Union meeting. Superior to all the hates and strife of men, and sure of her place in the hearts of her subjects and her ultimate niche in history, Queen Victoria has quietly celebrated her seventy-seventh birthday. If she lives until June 20 she will have ruled over the British Empire fifty-nine years.

The Situation in Turkey.

The American Board missionaries in Turkey have made Sir Phillip Currie aware, in a formal way, of their appreciation of his service to them while acting as British ambassador in Constantinople. May his successor be equally zealous in defense of American Christians, and may he have less difficulty in interpreting and more assistance in executing the real purpose of the British Foreign Office than Sir Phillip Currie has had. The revolution against the Turk on the Island of Crete has assumed formidable proportions, and the plight of the Christians has become such that the European Powers have dispatched men-of-war to render aid to their subjects if necessary. The situation at Zeitoun is appalling, so vast is the number of refugees without food, raiment and shelter, and, though Miss Barton writes encouraging letters of the progress of her work, the truth is that the supply of relief is insignificant compared with the demand for it.

NOTES.

The boycott of the Springfield baseball club, to which we referred last week, was ordered by the pastor, members and attendants of the First Church, and not by citizens, irrespective of denomination, assembled in a public mass meeting, as we inferred from news dispatches sent forth from Springfield. The example of this church should be imitated.

The death of Mme. Clara Schumann removes the most gifted pianist that the gentler sex has enrolled on its list of artists. The death of Archduke Charles Louis, brother of the emperor of Austria, puts in line of succession to the throne of Austria his son, Otto Francis Joseph, who can scarcely be counted upon to hold the dual empire together, for he is as decadent and immoral as his father was reactionary and blameless.

The commutation of the sentences of the five ringleaders in the conspiracy against the Transvaal from that of death to fifteen years' imprisonment does not satisfy or mollify the anti-Boer population of South Africa. Most of the minor conspirators are to be released after the payment of fines, nor are they to be banished. Mr. Chamberlain's latest utterances have contained covert British threats, and the situation can scarcely be said to be less strained than it was. German sympathy for the Transvaal is being expressed very openly, and the Reichstag voted a generous appropriation last week for the strengthening of the colonial forces in South Africa.

Mayor Brickett of Haverhill is to be congratulated for his determination to enforce the liquor law in that city, and Lynn bids fair to have quieter Sundays and less lawbreaking, as the result of the pressure brought to bear on public officials by the local Law and Order League. Mr. Faxon of Quincy is sending out statistics showing how that town has flourished under no license. In 1881, the last of license, the population was 10,855, the valuation was $7,560,381, the expense of caring for the town poor $15,415 and the savings bank deposits $173,950. In 1895 the population had increased to 20,712, the valuation to $17,325,855 and the savings bank deposits to $441,152, while expenses for supporting the town poor had decreased to $8,338.

The General Court of Massachusetts has referred to the next legislature the settlement of the question whether the late Benjamin F. Butler was worthy of having a memorial monument built and paid for by the State. This is simply evasion. Senator Sanger's charge that a member of the Senate, as yet unnamed, has been approached with venal offers by representatives of assessment insurance companies likely to be affected by legislation now before the legislature should, for the honor of the commonwealth, be thoroughly investigated. The investigation of the Norfolk County Board of County Commissioners is bringing forth facts respecting the devices of Boston business men and the corruption of contractors and officials which will compel us for a time at least to cease calling New York and Chicago bad names, lest we be charged with living in a glass house.

IN BRIEF.

We shall print next week a broadside on The Crowded Ministry.

"Neodoxy" is Dr. Joseph Parker's term for the faith of those who neither love Christ or hate him, but patronize him.

Theologians and thinkers may well rejoice that Prof. A. B. Bruce has been selected as the next lecturer on the Gifford foundation at the University of Glasgow.

We see it stated that Li Hung Chang is carrying a coffin with him on his trip around the world. Probably he remembers what happened when he made his visit to Japan.

The A. M. A. is to be congratulated on securing Mrs. Alice Freeman Palmer for a speaker at the jubilee meeting in Boston next fall. She will set forth the Educational Equipment Necessary for Missionary Service.

We are glad Boston is to have a monument of John Boyle O'Reilly. But the Phillips Brooks monument hangs like Mohammed's coffin between heaven and earth, and neither Longfellow, Whittier, Lowell nor Holmes has yet been thus honored.

It is significant that on April 19, Sunday, the Central Union Church, Honolulu, celebrated the 121st anniversary of the battles of Lexington and Concord, and the front seats were occupied by the Hawaiian chapter of the Sons of the American Revolution.

A straw indicating the increasingly important place accorded to Christian citizenship by the clergy is the recent action of a Bangor pastor who emphasized his exhortation to attend a primary by cheerfully adjourning his prayer meeting lest it prove an obstacle to following his advice.

It is a rare day that does not bring forward some paper solution of the problems of Boston Congregationalism. Meanwhile, we are all pretty well hereabouts, thank you, and do not consider our local problems any more serious than those which confront other cities and other denominations the country over.

Though several thousand of Mrs. Goodell's leaflet, A Month With Jesus, have been scattered all over the country, a few hundred more are still available and can be had for the asking if requests be directed to Miss Bridgman, 9 Shailer Street, Brookline. The inclosure of a two-cent stamp will secure as many copies as desired up to twenty-five.

The change in our methods and times of church work is noticeable in the return of anniversary week, which was once the center of the year for Massachusetts Congregationalists. The old order is maintained by the Unitarians and Universalists who in this particular have been more conservative than ourselves and give up the present week in Boston to numerous meetings and anniversaries.

The preservation of human life is reasonably considered more important than any other human function and the city fathers of Chicago have so legislated that physicians there have the right of way in the streets and on the bridges, no matter what may be happening, be it a conflagration, a civic or military procession, or any other ordinary or extraordinary obstacle to traffic. A badge and a special permit are given to each physician who applies and pays a small fee.

It is not the size of the Sabbath congregations only upon which the reign of the bicycle has an appreciable effect. From many lines of business come complaints that trade has fallen off very perceptibly. Livery stables lack patronage. Young women buy feathers and ribbons more sparingly, while, most painful of all to relate, growing youths economize on pipes and tobacco that they may have the best equipment possible for cycling. Verily the wheel is a radical and far-reaching influence.

A gratifying incident of the Andover anniversary, described elsewhere, was that the venerable Professor Park, now in his eighty-eighth year, who has been unable for some years to attend public exercises, was present at South Church. The audience arose to receive him as he went into the pulpit, and the orator of the day made a felicitous allusion to him. It was exactly sixty years ago that he went to Andover as professor of sacred rhetoric, and he has occupied the same house for the whole time.

A significant exhibition of the "loan collection" at Andover last week was Dr. Draper's two cases of Andover books, containing nearly four hundred volumes which he and his predecessors, from the time of "Flagg and Gould" in 1813, had published. Nor did this include books of wide celebrity, as those of Harriet Beecher Stowe and Elizabeth Stuart Phelps, and recent books of seminary and academy instructors written but not published in Andover. Is there any other country town in the United States which could make such a showing?

The intensity of the political situation in England and the feeling prevalent among Nonconformists that the government, in the matter of public education, is disposed to ride roughshod over the rights of some of the queen's most loyal and intelligent subjects gave a peculiar zest to the spring meeting of the Congregational Union, elsewhere fully reported. Our sturdy English brethren will come all the closer together because of the impending clouds. The Free Churches are too strongly rooted on English soil to suffer seriously from any adverse gale.

This admission by the Northwestern Christian Advocate (Methodist Episcopal) is significant:

At best, the making of all appointments is a delicate matter. A change of pastorate pulls up by the roots many churches and ministers. It is a dreadful and testful strain. At times it is so much of a strain that those chiefly concerned are reconciled only when the primest conditions exist. If it is suspected that favoritism of the most subtle kind is alleged, trouble is certain. If there is a quotable complication which does not relate to weakness of human motive, that trouble is no less certain. [Italics ours.—Ed.]

We respectfully call the attention of the editors of the daily newspapers of Boston to the fact that one of the leading scholars of Christendom and one of the greatest preachers of Great Britain occupied the pulpit of the Old South Church last Sunday morning and evening, and yet no reporter was sent to represent the public and not a word appeared in the Monday morning papers concerning the man or his message. This is not first-class journalism, judged by secular standards even. Do none of the many clergymen on the daily press of Boston know about Prof. George Adam Smith, professor in the Free Church College, Glasgow?

Another object of the late Dr. Alden's generous but unassuming benevolence, outside of those named in his will, was Yankton College, in which, a little over a year ago, he established a permanent scholarship. A few months later, when the college was in danger of losing Dr. Pearsons's and other conditional gifts, he immediately gave $10,000 to complete paying off the mortgage on the college buildings, thus enabling the fulfillment of the pledge to Dr. Pearsons and the Education Society. He was as deeply interested in the current work of the college and sent in only a few days before his death a large check to pay lapsed salaries. His total gifts within the last year and a quarter amounted to $16,000. Early in the year he accepted an invitation to deliver the Commencement address at Yankton College, death finding him with it already partially prepared.

The Michigan Christian Advocate quotes with approval a letter suggesting that the lack of a really democratic system is the explanation of "the loss to Methodism of many laymen of force of character and ability." In its leading editorial, on Methodism in Transition, it finds evidence in the present General Conference of a change of temper respecting the power of the episcopacy, and adds, "We are on the eve of great modifications. Our ministers and laymen are insisting upon representative government. The ultimate issue will be the equality of the lay element in the General Conference, lay representation in the annual conferences, and quarterly conferences largely elected by adult church members." Congregationalists have never feared to trust the people and are glad to see their confidence making its way in other quarters.

---

When the question of supplying a pulpit vacated not long ago by a Massachusetts pastor who had resigned came before the church, the committee naturally asked for a special appropriation. Thereupon a brother arose and in a somewhat aggressive manner asked if it wasn't the intention to have candidates. "Yes," replied the chairman of the committee. "Well, then," said the aggrieved member, "I don't see what you want of any appropriation for supplies. Don't candidates always give their services free?" If that were the case, the evils connected with the process might be reduced to a minimum, but we suspect that the custom itself would not be long lived. There are some limits to the accommodating spirit of the most obsequious specimen of the genus candidatus. The remark of the Negro pastor quoted last week in our Risibles column is pertinent again, "Brederen, yer can't expec' dis nigger to preach on earf an bo-ahd in heav'n."

---

The retirement of Bishops Bowman, Foster and Taylor by the Methodist General Conference recalls the time when Professor, afterward President, James H. Fairchild of Oberlin had to serve on the committee that waited on Mr. Finney to suggest that he lay down the more onerous responsibilities of his position as the head of Oberlin College. The duty was to him so painful that he and his brother Edward, then principal of Oberlin and afterward president of Berea College, pledged each other to resign on their seventieth birthday whatever position they might at that time hold. Both performed their pledge against the protest of the two faculties, but both adhered to the resolution, which, though deeply regretted, was no doubt a wise one. Not all men are thus wise, and not all bodies of men are so considerate and appreciative. Bishops Bowman, Foster and Taylor must surely find much solace in thinking of the high esteem in which they are held, not only by the Methodist Church but by Christians generally throughout the country. May they live many years to bless the church which still loves and honors them.

STAFF CORRESPONDENCE.

FROM THE INTERIOR.

Woman's Night at the Chicago Club.

The Congregational Club was organized with a provision in its constitution that the May meeting each year should be ladies' meeting. Within the last half-dozen years the number of these "ladies' nights," as they are called has steadily increased till one might say it is an exception when ladies are absent from our gatherings. Nor have they failed to take their turn in contributing to the interest and profit of these gatherings. They have told us how to manage Sunday schools, how to educate our girls, how to save waifs, how to break up sweat shops, in fact, there are few reformatory topics upon which they have not spoken. Never, however, till last Monday night have we given up the whole time to the ladies and made them entirely responsible for the entertainment. The experiment was a success. The number present was beyond all anticipation. The papers and addresses were equal to the occasion, both in timeliness of thought and in grace of expression.

The West Side Woman's Club.

The first paper was by Mrs. George Sherwood, president of the West Side Woman's Club. She told us what women's clubs are doing for the city. Before she had finished her paper we felt like asking, what are they not doing? They wage war against crime of every sort. They strive to break up sweat shops, to furnish work to needy women in times of depression, to provide for homeless girls, to fill up the leisure time of well-to-do women with opportunities for self-improvement and usefulness. There are not less than 500 women's clubs in the country with perhaps a million members. There are federated clubs representing twenty States. Probably in Chicago there are 10,000 women in club life, 3,000 of them working girls. The oldest club in the city is a literary club, the Fortnightly. This club is twenty-two years old and has been an important factor in the intellectual life of the city. It has done not a little to break up and prevent the caste feeling which sometimes finds its way into the higher social circles of our cities and to bring women of similar tastes and aspirations together in the pursuit of common objects. The Young Woman's Fortnightly is discharging a similar mission. The Chicago Woman's Club has given more than $40,000 toward the reformatory school for boys at Glenwood.

The South Side Club.

The South Side Club, formed in 1884, whose members spend a few hours each week in the study of art, literature and philosophy, through its social departments has reached with substantial aid more than 50,000 persons. There are also the Hull House Club, the Jane Club composed of forty girls, who have united to secure for themselves the comforts of a good home at a moderate expense, the Friday Club for the study of art and literature, which raised over $35,000 for the Children's Building at the World's Fair, the North Side Art Club, the New England Art Club, each with 300 members, and the West Side Club, one of the strongest and most aggressive philanthropic organizations in the city. There are also the International Club of Lutheran women, the National Club of Roman Catholic women and a club of Jewish women, each of which is exerting a powerful influence upon the social and philanthropic life of the city. There is a club for female journalists, another known as the Chicago Free Bath and Sanitary League, which seeks to provide public baths on the lake front, and in addition there are the dozens of working girls' clubs already described in a former issue of The Congregationalist. If the purpose of these clubs was primarily social or, in some instances, intellectual improvement, it may be asserted that with scarcely an exception their purpose now is philanthropic. Their members are not content to meet together simply for social and intellectual enjoyment. They insist on discussing methods by means of which they may prevent crime, save neglected children, or furnish needed aid to those who are temporarily in distress. Through their influence not a few valuable laws have found their way into our statute-books, and not a few which were failing to accomplish their object or were hindering its accomplishment have been repealed.

Women in Art and Literature.

Mrs. Sherwood's paper whetted our appetites for the next paper on What Women Are Doing in Art and Literature by Mrs. N. H. Blatchford. The revelations which Mrs. Blatchford made of the part women have had in founding and developing the Art Institute were a surprise to nearly all present. This magnificent building with its priceless treasures owes more than can be said to the wise and generous gifts of women. One need only mention the Henry Field memorial room, decorated by Tiffany, with its costly paintings of the French school, the Eldridge G. Hall collections, the treasures of the Antiquarian Society and the Braun photographs, presented by Mrs. D. K. Pearsons at a cost of $10,000. At present 466 young men are studying art in the institute and 612 young women. Some of the women who have graduated from this school have already won recognition for their talents as artists. Nor have Chicago women failed to secure fame as authors. One need only mention the nom de plume Amber to recall a personage of rare gifts as a writer. Mary A. Krout, now in London, and Lilian Whiting of Boston as correspondents of one of the great dailies, Lilian Bell, Carrie Louise Burnham, Mrs. Linden Bates, Miss Monroe, Mary Abbot, Miss Kirkland suggest intellectual gifts which encourage great hope for the future.

Other Addresses.

An address from Mrs. Martha Foot Crowe of the University of Chicago, on what women are doing in education, was full of interest. She was followed by Miss Mary McDowell of the University Settlement, who described her work among the uneducated and told how some of the hard-working women of the ward in which she lives, near the stock yards, and the cultured women of one of the richest wards in the city by meeting together and talking over the problems of the times have come to see eye to eye and to be bound together by most friendly feelings.

It was a significant feature of the meeting that every one of the speakers bore witness to the fact that woman's highest sphere is that of a home maker, and did not hesitate to say that if membership in a club interferes with that the club should be given up. It was claimed, however, that experience has proved that club life has enlarged the mental horizon of woman, developed her character and introduced her into a larger life than she had previously known.

CHRISTIAN MARTYRS ON THE STAGE.

BY H. A. B.

Nothing in great, resourceful London is so interesting, so significant to me just now as the drama entitled The Sign of the Cross, which Wilson Barrett, its author, is presenting night after night before great audiences in his West End theater. It is, in my judgment, the most remarkable play of the century. Whether or not it is to mark the beginning of a new epoch in the history and uses of the theater and in the attitude of many Christians toward it, the play is in itself, in the motive out of which it was born, and in the reception accorded it, a phenomenon which the thoughtful people of two continents cannot afford to ignore.

Most of us are probably aware that the tendency of the theater for the last few years has been a down-grade tendency. One does not have to enter the doors of a playhouse to realize this fact. The bill-board, newspaper reports and popular comment alike make it evident. Within the profession itself are men and women who have been lamenting, and in some degree opposing, this drift as bitterly as any uncompromising foe of the drama on general principles. But the first actor to step out of the beaten paths to the extent of reproducing a period of Christian history is Mr. Wilson Barrett, already long and favorably known to the best classes of theater-goers on both sides of the Atlantic.

For several years the idea of a drama which should picture the life of the early Christians in the midst of their enemies had been germinating in Mr. Barrett's mind. Not a playwright himself, he endeavored to enlist in the service of his plan some writer of recognized ability. The proposition met with scant favor both from the makers, the critics and the managers of plays, so far as they were consulted. But Mr. Barrett would not abandon his thought, and after turning it over unceasingly in his mind it finally took form, and a little over a year ago the four-act drama, The Sign of the Cross, was produced for the first time in St. Louis. Meeting instantly with favor, it was given in several American cities, but the season being so well advanced its fame was not generally heralded through the East, nor did the company visit either New York or New England.

Mr. Barrett would not consider his production an unqualified success until it had run the gauntlet of English criticism, and on his return to Great Britian last summer awaited with keen expectation its effect upon audiences composed of his own countrymen. Its first rendering, in Leeds, last autumn, established it at once in popular esteem, and a circuit through middle and northern England only added to its fame. It remained only for fastidious London to set the seal of its approval upon the play, and how the world's metropolis is disposed toward it may be judged from the fact that already for nearly 150 nights it has crowded one of the largest theaters of the city with audiences that have embraced many of the clergy and others prominent in the churches, as well as the leaders of society and the representatives of the aristocracy and the nobility. The press, both religious and secular, has discussed it freely and almost without exception favorably, and one cannot be in London a single day even without being accosted more than once with the query, "Have you seen Barrett in The Sign of the Cross?"

The mere popularity of a current drama, it is true, does not entitle it to the consideration and respect of sober-minded people. But when an actor of the type of Mr. Barrett hazards his professional standing and takes a large financial risk in the interests of a noble ideal, which to many of his closest friends and advisers seemed quixotic, he deserves a measure of recognition and applause. Personally I believe that he has been actuated by a far higher motive than that which might induce a shrewd theatrical manager to venture into an untried field. Not to cater to the eye and ear of the populace, but to lift the stage to the level of its highest possibilities has been Mr. Barrett's ruling impulse. Believing that God has given to certain men and women the dramatic faculty, that it is as truly a divine implanting as is the artistic or the musical talent, and believing, on the other hand, that the great mass of mankind are susceptible to powerful influence from the stage for good or for evil, he has sought to eliminate that which feeds vain desires and sensual appetites and to appeal directly to that which is noblest in the heart of man.

The scenes of the play are laid in Rome in the year 64 A. D., when the Christians were a hunted sect and Nero, the representative of all that was basest and weakest in heathenism, was sitting upon the throne of the Cæsars. The hero of the play, Marcus, the prefect of Rome, happens to rescue one day in the street Favius, an aged Christian, who was being hounded by the rabble. The beautiful young woman accompanying Favius pleases the prefect's fancy, and he takes pains to keep himself informed with respect to her movements. Meanwhile comes an edict from Nero enjoining upon Marcus the duty of exterminating all the Christian residents of Rome. He would gladly spare Mercia, the object of his sudden affection, and delays as long as he dares the execution of the sentence. But other officers are apprehending the followers of Christ and putting mere boys to the torture in order to ascertain where the gatherings for worship are held. The Roman soldiers surprise the Christians thus assembled, hale them to prison and subsequently send them to the gladiators and the lions. Marcus, after several bold but unavailing appeals to Cæsar for the life of Mercia, and having been held at bay by the strength and purity of her womanhood when he was tempted forcibly to possess himself of her, finally becomes a Christian and goes hand in hand with her to death.

Naturally all the art and resources known to the modern stage are called into requisition to make impressive and vivid this representation of the days when in imperial Rome Christianity and heathenism were just entering upon that deadly and apparently unequal combat, the circumstances and the outcome of which constitute the most thrilling chapter in the annals of mankind. As one sits in this London playhouse he is transported, whether he will or not, to the Rome of the first Christian century. He enters the luxurious, sumptuous homes of the wealthy patricians and the humble, unadorned dwelling of a Christian family. The heated, noxious atmosphere of the gay social assemblage and the wild, riotous talk of so-called ladies and gentlemen, given to deep and frequent potations, contrast sharply with the quiet grove by the river, where the Christians meet to worship the one living and true God and to raise to him their songs of gratitude and trust. Nero's palace, the weak, whimsical, conceited tyrant, his handsome but equally cruel wife, Poppæa, and their obsequious and fawning retinue of servants and willing tools, even the cringing, animal-faced spies that ferret out the Christians — all these evidences of a corrupt, licentious but omnipotent court do but throw into a more attractive light the dungeon where the condemned Christians await their doom, and the brave and brotherly spirit which they exhibit. Moreover, through the entire drama you discern its central motive — the gradual but steady operation of Christianity in action upon a proud pagan hitherto accustomed to give free rein to his passions. "What this Christianity is," says Marcus, at one point in the drama, when his mind is awakening to the realization that there may be some good in the hated, ostracized religion, "I know not, but this I know, that if it makes many women as pure as Mercia, Rome, nay, the whole world, will be all the purer for it."

The drama deals at such close range with the Christian religion that one who has not seen it might naturally fear that it would at times pass the bounds of good taste and reverence. But that is not the case. The parts are taken so sympathetically, and the general movement is so decorous and reverent that even the frequent use of the words of Christ and of the apostles does not seem out of place, provided one appreciates the spirit of the whole undertaking and what it aims to do.

The value of this new and noteworthy production to my mind lies first of all in the fact that it gives reality to the facts of Christian history. Who does not need ever and again to be reminded of the point that our precious faith is rooted in actual events? It is not a legend or a myth. Jesus was really present in the world and the message which he brought, the life which he lived, the death which he died, the hold which he established upon the hearts of men are as indisputable historical realities as the campaigns of Cæsar or the sacking of Rome by the Goths. To the skeptic, the agnostic, to the persons who never open their New Testaments, Wilson Barrett's play says, "Here is something with which you must reckon; you cannot dispose of the Christian religion as a golden dream or as an out-worn theory."

Furthermore, this play recalls to Christians the heroic character of their faith. We forget too readily in these days, when the profession of Christianity costs us nothing, that there was a time when men and women and little children went to the rack and poured out their lifeblood rather than deny their Master. That noble hymn of Heber's came forcibly to mind when I left the theater at the end of the play, particularly the verse:

> A noble army, men and boys,
> The matron and the maid,
> Around their Saviour's throne rejoice,
> In robes of light arrayed.
> They climbed the steep ascent of heaven
> Through peril, toil and pain.
> O God to us may grace be given
> To follow in their train.

And I was not surprised to find in one of the London papers the next day a letter to the editor, in which the writer said, responding to some criticisms that had been passed upon the play, "After having seen this beautiful play my only aim has been to serve my Master as Mercia did."

It hardly seems to me too much to say that Mr. Barrett and his coadjutors are setting forth the Christian gospel in the midst of all the materialism and selfishness of the world's greatest, and possibly its wickedest, city. Close to the doors of his theater presses nightly that mad procession of brazen, painted creatures, whose public barter of their womanhood constitutes the shame of London. Within the playhouse itself night after night gather many eminently respectable people no doubt, but idlers and triflers in the face of life's great duties and opportunities. It is in the midst of such conditions as these that Wilson Barrett is forcing men and women over whom the church has little influence to think of Christianity as a historical fact and as a power in the life of man. It is the simple, broad, vital faith which he presents —that faith which makes men and women strong and calm, patient and pure, loving and forgiving, loyal alike to earthly monarchs and to the unseen and risen Master, the source of all their courage and of their final victory over their foes. And so long as this is the effect of Wilson Barrett's drama, I, for one, wish him Godspeed.

MARSE WHIT'S BRE'KFUS'.

BY EDNAH PROCTOR CLARKE.

It was the second day at Gettysburg. The morning sun looked down on the cradled valley that had waked to find itself a battlefield, and flecked with cloud shadows the mighty peaks of the encircling hills—hills that had waited through time for this July day.

The thrill of expectant battle was in the air. The gray files of the Army of Northern Virginia stretched southward along Seminary Ridge, and across the valley from Culp's Hill to Little Roundtop the battalions of the enemy wheeled to position. Already at intervals Meade's batteries were shelling Seminary Hill, and in the open plain between, behind chance protection of rock or shrub, the skirmishers of both armies lay with leveled rifles.

"'Scuse me, Cap'n, but kin you tell me whar's Marse Whit?"

The young officer, his gray uniform stained with the dust of the night's travel, lowered his field glass and faced his questioner: "Hello, Pete! When did you come up?"

"De Commissary wagons is jes in, sah. I hu't my foot las' night—'twarn't nuffin', an's all right now—but Marse Whit made me stay an' ride 'stead o' marchin'. I jes done fix his bre'kfus'," he lifted a tin pail into sight, "an' please tell me whar's he at."

"There." The officer pointed down over the ridge into the field below. "There by those gray rocks and the alder bushes"—

"Dar?" Pete's jaw dropped. "Dar, wid dem cannons spoutin' yonner an' dem Yanks lyin' dar to pop'm like a squir'l! Lawd! Marse Cap'n, you oughtn' sont dat chile a place like dat!"

"Child!" The captain laughed. "He could whip you with one hand, Pete."

Pete shook his head. "He ain't but sebenteen las' Crismus, do' he's so big. Him an' me wuz bawn de same day, him at de house an' me in de quarters, an' my mammy nu's us bof at her bres'. He nuver wuz on skirmish line befo', an' you oughtn' sont him dar."

"He has to take his turn with the rest of us." The captain's voice softened. "The line was set at midnight and can't be relieved till dark again."

"Marse Whit out in de fiel' all night—an' no bre'kfus' an' mos' noon—an' me gabblin' heah!" and Pete saluted and wheeled away.

The captain turned abruptly, "What are you going to do?" he demanded.

"Do?" Pete raised his eyes wonderingly. "Why, tek Marse Whit his bre'kfus'."

"Take him his breakfast—where?"

"Why, down in de fiel'," Pete's tone was still more wondering and a trifle exasperated. "I gwine cut down de hill an' cross de lot an' tek Marse Whit his bre'kfus'."

"Good God! boy, do you know what you are saying? Do you see Meade's batteries, do you see those crouching men in blue, do you know not a rabbit could lift its head from the stubble without being seen and shot? Look there!" as a shell from across the valley sung past them carrying its destruction into the camp behind.

Pete shook his head doggedly. "Marse Whit gotter have his bre'kfus'," he said. "Ole Marse tol' me to tek keer on him. Ole Marse giv' two sons to de cause an' Marse Whit de las' one. 'Tek keer on him, Pete,' he say, 'do yo' bes'.' Marse Whit cain't stan' hit de whole night an' de whole day starvin', he gotter have his bre'kfus'."

The captain bit his lip impatiently. "Don't be a fool," he said. "Don't you suppose your life means more to Whit Davies than a few hours' hunger? I won't see you go to certain death like that. As your commanding officer I forbid it."

Pete turned, his thick lips trembling, his voice breaking at every word: "Doan say dat, Marse Cap'n—doan! Why what dis nigger for, 'cep'n to wait on Marse Whit? We belongs to one anudder, Marse Whit an' me. All de way frum Norf Ca'liny we's marched, step by step, an' slep under de same blanket some nights, an' dey nuver wuz a corn pone, dey nuver wuz a chunk o' po'k, but Marse Whit giv' me ha'f. Doan say dat Marse Cap'n—doan! How cud I go back an' tell Ole Marse I done my bes' an' Marse Whit starvin'?"

The gallant young officer, who, on the morrow, was to lead in the foremost ranks of that hopeless, dauntless charge that swept up the iron hights of Cemetery Hill and marked the angled wall in blood, looked at the boy with kindling eyes.

"Go!" he said. And then, with an involuntary gesture, he lifted his hand as he would have saluted his general. But Pete did not see nor comprehend. He was looking across the field to the gray rocks and the alders.

Out under the glare of the noon sun Whit Davies was lying, his head resting on his folded arms. The long vigil, the hunger and something else—something he was trying to forget—had blanched the boyish face beneath its tan and set deep lines of pain about the sensitive lips. He was sick at heart, sick for home, smitten down with a sense of loneliness and misery such as had never touched his young life before. He was looking away from the embattled peaks to where the hills swept in untroubled hights, blue beyond blue, and the sky met them. His eyes grew misty a moment. Surely the cloud shadows yonder were drifting over King's Mountain, the rustling leaves beside him were the great white oaks in his father's yard, and the darkies were singing in the quarters.

The sound was so real, so near, he turned his head involuntarily. A cry broke from his lips: "My God!—not Pete! No! no! Not Pete!"

Down the slope of Seminary Hill a figure was running, under the range of a thousand guns and fifty batteries, leaping, springing over rock and stump and bush as if on a holiday pleasuring, swinging a shining bucket and chanting an old plantation song. The belching cannon had hushed their challenges an instant, and as the boy came on, of all the serried ranks opposing, not a rifle was lifted. Perhaps the watching veterans guessed or understood, but the hill was conquered, the field won, and, breathless, laughing, unhurt, Pete dropped at his master's side.

Whit's arm flung out across his shoulders dragging him down: "You good-for-nothing—trump!" The words choked him and he laughed, boylike, to cover it.

Pete's eyes were shining. "I done fool dem Yanks dis time!" he chuckled. "Marse Whit, heah's yo' bre'kfus'."

"And you risked your life—lie low!"

The Federal batteries had opened again, and twenty yards from them a furrow was plowed through the parched grass.

Pete squirmed. "Too many hornets in dis heah lot," he said, making with arms and knees a hollow such as Whit had made in the loose soil and scooping a hole for his pail. He did not like to look at his master just then.

"What you 'spec' I got?" he asked.

Whit dashed his hand across his face and shook his head. Then the sense of something living and loving beside him brought the joy of life flooding back into his heart. His eyes danced as Pete with an air of conscious pride lifted the corn pone that covered the contents of the pail.

"Chicken! Pete, you black rascal, whose henroost did you rob last night?"

Pete's injured innocence was a sight for the gods. "Robbin'? Dat chicken, Marse Whit, dat chicken wuz a d'serter. He cut outen de Kurnel's coop in the wagon las' night, an' wuz mekin' stret back fo' ole Virginny, an' de Kurnel's orders wuz 'Ex'cute all d'serters on sight'!"

"And I suppose"—Whit tore a wing apart, "here, take some yourself or I won't touch it—I suppose you didn't present him back to 'de Kurnel' with your compliments?"

Pete's white teeth met in the drumstick. "Go way, Marse Whit! When Providence done frow a chicken at dis nigger's haid, he ain' projeckin' roun' to frow hit back agin."

"Well, it's powerful good," Whit reached for another piece. "I didn't know how hungry I was till I began to eat."

"Tek de odder corn pone," said Pete, hospitably, fishing it out from the bottom of the pail. "Hit's browner den de fu'st. Is you jes' bin lyin' out heah doin' nuffin sense las' night?"

All the joy and light went suddenly out of Whit's face. He dropped the chicken from his hand.

"I've done—something," he said, slowly. "O Pete—I've shot a man. No—I can't eat any more—I'd forgotten a moment. It was over there by that big rock—he was crawling to it to get in the shade I think—and raised himself—and you know I can shoot—and—he threw up his arms and went backward—I'd forgotten"— The boy's head went down on his arms again.

Pete held out the pone mutely. "Dat's what you heah fo', Marse Whit," he said, after a moment. "Dat's what you heah fo'."

Whit turned his face towards him. "I know—but this was—different. I never was on picket duty before. In a battle everybody's shooting and you don't know where the bullets go, and you are as likely to get hit as the rest. But here—out here alone—and he over there alone—and to take aim deliberately. It wasn't like war—but"—

The voice had failed entirely now; the broad shoulders were heaving like a child's.

Pete dropped the pone. "For Gawd's sake doan, Marse Whit!" He crept closer, flinging his arm about him, as he had done bivouacking on the frozen ground when the snow drifted down on their one blanket.

"Doan—doan—I nuver seed you do dat—a-way befo' in all my bawn days! Doan tek on so—he warn' nuffin but a no count Yank, no how"—

"Hush!" Whit raised his head, his gray eyes ablaze. "Pete!" he said, suddenly, "do you know what that man over there died for? Do you know what they are fighting for? Do you know you could cross this field and be free—free? Not my slave, nor any man's slave, but free?"

Pete looked across the dusty field and then back in the glowing face beside him. "Who gwine bring yo' bre'kfus' den, Marse Whit? Who gwine tote de blanket an' rake up de fire? What I want go to de Yanks fo'? Is dey bin good to me, like you an' Ole Marse? Why Ole Marse nuver whup me in his life, cep'n he whup us bofe de same fo' some fool trick. What I want go to de Yanks fo'?" His voice faltered. "Doan look like dat, Marse Whit."

Whit's hand went out and rested an instant on the gray shoulder nearest him. "I wish they knew," he said, looking across the field. "I wish they knew! They don't know us, Pete, and perhaps—perhaps—we don't know them either." He stopped, bending his head back to look up in the cloud-flecked sky that arched its tender blue from ridge to ridge.

"I can't think straight, some way, today," he went on, after a pause. "Do you see that flag over there, Pete?" He pointed to Meade's headquarters. "Four years ago day after tomorrow, at the big barbecue, do you remember how we ran it up clear to the top of the staff and all the crowd cheered themselves hoarse? And grandfather's father fought for it with Nathan Green. Seems like there was a mistake somewhere." He turned his face to the northward hills again, hills that in Pennsylvania as in North Carolina were lifting their changeless peaks against the blue.

Pete did not understand. He crept closer with that sympathy of silence dogs know, and some men.

After a moment Whit spoke again more to himself than to the other.

"Do you remember what father said when we marched away? 'North Carolina calls you, and the greatest thing on earth is to do your duty.' But," his eyes wandered across to the big rock again, "wasn't it his duty too? Which of us is right—O, I can't think it straight!" He drew in his breath with a shiver.

Pete stirred uneasily. "'Twill all cum right somehow, Marse Whit, doan you fret. What dey doin' back yonner?"

Far to the south Hood's division crept nearer the Federal left. Soon the dark hights of Roundtop would break in sudden flame, and men made in God's image struggling like tigers through tangled glade, up jagged ledge, fall crushed and dying among the unheedful stones. Soon the warm harvest fields would shudder beneath charging feet and the westering sun look back on blackened homesteads, withered orchard boughs and trampled wheat wet with strange, clotted dew. Already the cannonading on Cemetery Hill had quickened. Sharpshooters grew vigilant, and shell and ball cut their death lines through the air.

The two crouching by the alder bush looked back to see the stir of troops on Seminary Hill—the quick galloping of a messenger. The "stars and bars" caught the breeze and floated free against the blue, and a cry, the cry of the Southland, came down to them.

Whit lifted his head, his eyes were like stars. Those were the men he had marched with from the old North State—the men who had sworn to lift her flag and strike in her name! Could there be higher death, higher purpose than that? The thrill of the nearing conflict swept through his veins, blotting out all else.

"They are moving, Pete, and we not there! O, to lie here like cowards while they"— Pete's hand clutched his wrist. "Gawd, Marse Whit!"

He pointed before them, and the next instant had flung himself above, in front of, his master. The explosion seemed in their very ears. Then the smoke and dust cleared away. The pieces of the shell, save one, had scattered harmlessly. Pete raised himself, and fell forward on his face.

Keeping his own head low with some blind instinct of self-preservation, Whit turned the boy's slight form over.

Through that jagged tear in the breast the blood came in quick spurts, soaking the gray jacket, dripping down on the untasted corn pone, and dimming the brightness of the shining pail.

"Pete! Pete! Put your hand here. Help me. Press hard, help me!"

Pete's eyes, already filmy, opened and fixed themselves in unutterable love on the face above him.

"'Tain't no use, Marse Whit. Hit doan hurt—much. Tell Ole Marse I done my bes'—I done my—"

The words failed, the head drooped backward.

"My God! I can't have you die so! Pete, Pete!" and with the boy in his arms Whit was on his feet, staggering, stumbling, leaping over the furrows back to the camp.

"You shan't die, Pete. I'll get you to the lines—the surgeon! We'll go home together—back to father, back"—

. . . . . .

"Bring them together boys. I cannot separate them."

The young captain, his head bared in the moonlight, looked down on the two at his feet, clasped as they fell—the two who had died for something greater than victory or defeat.

Through the night-shielded valley gleamed the bivouac fires, lighting fitfully the shattered cannon, the mangled horses, the dying and the dead. Tomorrow would bring again the struggle, and afterwards—? He lifted his eyes. The white fingers of the moonlight lay in peace across the riven fields, and beyond, shadow and silver, were the lifted peaks of the eternal hills.

A BIT OF WARTIME HEROISM.

Just at this time in May, thirty-three years ago, began the attack on Port Hudson which lasted until the eighth of July, and was the scene of the wounding and death of so many of our brave boys. On the fourteenth of June a terrific attack was made upon the enemy's breastworks with little result save strewing the ground for hundreds of yards with the dead and wounded. During the following night, fatigue parties attempting to remove the wounded from the scene of carnage were frequently fired upon by the enemy.

From the Twelfth Connecticut regiment a captain, with a corporal who volunteered to assist him, started to go to the relief of one poor fellow who seemed to be suffering intensely and unable to move. As they worked along toward him they met a soldier from the Twelfth Maine returning from a similar though unsuccessful errand. Turning about, he accompanied them to the last sheltered position directly opposite the poor fellow. The captain threw off his accouterments to crawl to him with a canteen of water for which he was calling piteously. But the soldier from Maine pulled the captain back, saying, "If any one makes the attempt it shall be me, for I am smaller than you and shall be less observed."

The two watched him with breathless anxiety until he had covered three-fourths of the distance, and they began to hope he might reach the sufferer. Then a voice from the breastworks called out, "Hallo, there! Hallo, there, I say." No answer. He simply hugged the ground. "Hallo, there! Answer, or I will shoot you." Seeing many guns leveled at him, he answered feebly, "What?" "Are you wounded?" "Yes" (feebly). "Well, what are you trying to do?" "Getting water to a wounded comrade." "Get up and give it to him and then come in here." He stood, lifted the canteen to the poor fellow's lips, gave him the stimulant he had for the purpose, then, looking about to estimate the distance back to our shelter, before he could move the voice said, "Come in here, or we'll put a hundred bullets through you." The captain sadly waved his hand as the soldier looked imploringly for aid, and advised him to go and save his life. It was his only hope. Slowly he turned and limped up the embankment, as noble and brave a sacrifice as was ever offered for a fellowman.

The next morning the wounded soldier lay cold in death on the plain. During that morning the captain lost an arm, being shot by a sharpshooter, and was carried to the rear. Long, weary months of fearful sickness ensued, during which he left the service never learning the fate of the noble fellow taken prisoner.

A short time ago the story as told by the captain was published in the National Tribune of Washington. Soon after its issue he received a letter from the editor asking his name and address, which were sent. A little later, to his surprise and delight, he received from a town in Wisconsin a letter, the purport of which was: "I am the prisoner of Port Hudson and am contemplating a visit East soon, and shall be glad to renew the acquaintance unexpectedly cut short on the battlefield." Delightful visits have been made of late and the thrilling experiences of that awful night vividly depicted. Surely, "truth is stranger than fiction." This is, indeed, a romance of war.

ANNUAL ASSEMBLY OF ENGLISH CONGREGATIONALISTS.

BY OUR LONDON CORRESPONDENT.

DR. BERRY ELECTED CHAIRMAN. MESSAGES TO AMERICAN BRETHREN.

The assembly in London, May 11–15, of the Congregational Union of England and Wales will certainly rank as one of the most memorable of the sixty-four annual gatherings that have been held. Questions of great moment to Congregationalists and some of vital importance to all Nonconformists have come up for consideration and been discussed with remarkable vigor, ability, fairness and good temper. Having attended every one of the meetings, I can testify that the attendance was unusually large, the interest keen at every point, and the level of the speeches above the average. The outstanding characteristic of the meetings was the intense devotion shown to the principles of Independent Nonconformity, the most resolute determination being expressed at all costs to maintain those principles at this critical period in the history of the Free Churches of England.

There is no previous nomination of chairman except such as appears in the newspapers. This year two names were thus proposed by two sets of ministers, and there was some uncertainty as to how the ballot would go. At the business meeting of representative members, which began at 5.30, it transpired that 684 votes had been recorded, a clear majority of that number being necessary to secure election. When it was announced that 496 had been given to Dr. Charles A. Berry of Wolverhampton there was a burst of prolonged applause. This honor, the highest the denomination has to bestow, is conferred upon Dr. Berry at the comparatively early age of forty-four, but the great services he has already rendered the denomination, especially in its relation to the state, fully entitle him to the distinction. His election is unanimously approved in both the religious and secular press, and much satisfaction is expressed that he was not enticed away to Brooklyn.

At the business meeting of the union the report presented by Secretary Woods stated that in view of the Venezuela dispute the committee of the union "felt specially bound to take every opportunity for strengthening and manifesting unity with the United States, with whose churches the union has always cherished intimate relations," cited the message in the interest of peace cabled to your National Council and its "prompt and affectionate response," and declared there could be no doubt that the action of Christian men on both sides of the Atlantic told powerfully in allaying irritation. Next was reported a correspondence between Dr. Hazen and Mr. Woods, referring to the second International Congregational Council to be held in Boston in June, 1899, the union committee urging that a special endeavor should be made to send an adequate representation from this country, so that England may worthily take her place in an assembly of Congregationalists from every part of the world. Attention was called to the arrangements for the laying by the American ambassador, on June 29, of the foundation stone of the John Robinson Memorial Church, towards which £3,500 has been subscribed, mention being made that a large deputation of Congregationalists would be present from America.

The year's receipts of the union, including book sales, was £15,338; about half of the balance on the year, £635, was allotted to the denominational societies, the remainder being set aside for the further development of the publishing department. In moving a resolution regretting that English railway companies persistently refuse to make the same reduction of fares to travelers to religious gatherings as are regularly made to travelers to race meetings, Rev. R. B. Brindley, Nottingham, instanced the more liberal policy that obtains on American railroads as worthy of imitation by British companies. Mr. Woods, who steadily grows in popularity with his brethren, having been re-elected secretary, the meeting resumed the discussion, adjourned from last year, of the report of the special committee for revision of the constitution of the union. The changes made are mostly in matters of detail, and their general effect is to strengthen the union's democratic basis. The committee is increased from seventy-two to ninety, and they are empowered to arrange for two or more provincial assemblies in the autumn. Hitherto it has been the practice to hold one autumnal assembly in a large town, and the new departure is to enable the union to visit smaller places, which could not accommodate the full tale of delegates. Lay members of the committee will in future be on the same footing as ministers in being entitled to receive from union funds their traveling expenses in attending two meetings in the year.

The next morning, Tuesday, the assembly met in the City Temple, the area being entirely occupied by delegates and the gallery filled with visitors—the largest gathering of recent years. After a devotional service came the address of the retiring chairman, Rev. J. Morlais Jones, the poet preacher of Lewisham. Taking for his keynote Browning's quaint phrase, "Wanting Is What?" Mr. Jones submitted that despite our manifold progress something is missing, and devoted his address to the task of showing what is wanting. First he put the renewal of the purely religious life of the church, which will come only by prayer, private and public. Next was needed a restatement of the truth given us to preach. Truth, said the speaker, is immortal and never changes, but the way of expressing the truth constantly varies. To build is the need of the hour, and this is what the masters in theology, Wendt, Beyschlag, "and our Dr. Fairbairn, the exponent of the best that is in us," have set themselves. In this restatement a greater place than ever must be given to the Lord Jesus Christ; in theology or business, social or national life, he must be the center. The third need was to set the churches of many names in their right relations to one another. The union which means the amalgamation of all denominations or the absorption of all denominations in one denomination was the special proposal of the Anglican Church. "But we have no desire to return." This frank avowal was loudly applauded. "We do more brilliant service to the common church by maintaining our individuality, cultivating our special gifts and remaining where we are."

The fourth need was a restatement of Congregationalism and a redefinition of its duties. We have a proud history, but it is growing upon us that somehow we have missed the mark—we are losing touch of the day that now is. Congregationalism in ideal is beautiful; Congregationalism as it exists is far too often of a degenerated type. It must be born again. To this end we must (1) realize its solidarity and share in the larger life of the denomination, especially by supporting struggling churches in town and country; (2) get the working man into the texture and fabric of the church—by putting him on church committees, by abolishing the unwritten law that the first qualification to be a deacon is the possession of a check-book, by modifying the pew rent system; and (3) re-establish our hold on the young. The address, which lasted a full hour and a half, was full of charm. The illustrations were particularly felicitous, the humor was delicate and natural, the spiritual tone was of the highest, the catholicity of the sentiment was all-embracing. A memorable incident occurred when, referring to the education question, the chairman said, "The battle has begun, we will fight to our last breath"; at once there was a tempest of applause.

After this "battle cry for the hour," as Dr. John Brown called it, the assembly settled down to practical work. The prospects of the Church Aid Society continue to improve, the minimum stipends of almost all ministers of aided churches having been raised to £80 and some to £100. Dr. Mackennal spoke of the need of maintaining the work of the churches in rural districts and of meeting the religious needs of growing populations. He has no faith in the cry, back to the land, regarding the drift from country to town as inevitable. But he wants to see in every village a resident Nonconformist minister to stem the tide of "rampant and advancing clericalism," and as he hopes that that may be one of the results of Free Church federation he cheerfully devotes his closing years, which he had looked forward to spend in a quiet pastorate, to that moment, though it entails the most arduous work of his life. To meet the needs of large towns the church extension committee reported in favor of a special central fund, which two brothers who jointly contributed £1,000 consider should be not less than £100,000. Dr. Barrett, our delegate to the American Triennial Council, reported his visit to that body.

On Thursday morning there was a special assembly in the Memorial Hall for the consideration of public questions. The session was made historic by Dr. Berry's outspoken words to the Irish party on their attitude to the education bill. In voting for that measure he said they deserted not only their friends but their principles, and their falsity had postponed home rule to a date which could not be guessed. "When that question comes to the front I shall vote for it, but meanwhile I will never put that question before other questions. We have waited too long; for our questions we will go first." This declaration, which was followed by a prolonged demonstration of approval, comes with all the more weight after Dr. Berry's election to the chair. Lord Rosebery is said to have been waiting for an expression of Nonconformist feeling on this point. He now has it and with unmistakable clearness. The threat of Mr. Hirst Hollowell that if the school boards are to be turned into happy hunting grounds for priests we will not pay the rate aroused similar enthusiasm. Rev. H. Storer Toms, ex-chairman of the London Union, a man not given to extravagance, suggested at a previous meeting that in this controversy it may be necessary for Nonconformists to go to prison, if they are to be true to their principles, and the suggestion has been seriously taken up by not a few.

Moving a resolution on international arbitration Dr. Rogers, who spoke with astonishing vigor, said: "Can there be any real difficulty between us and our American friends? They were here amongst us not long ago; we rejoice to think they are coming here again [applause], and I think before they come they should have this message from the Congregational Union of England and Wales, that we are resolved, come what will, whatever party be in power, however inconvenient it may be to party interests on the one side or on the other, we are determined that between our two peoples there shall be only real, lasting and blessed unity." [Loud applause.]

In the evening the young people of the denomination met for a conversazione, when stimulating words were addressed to them by Dr. Horton and others. On Friday morning the closing assembly was held in the Memorial Hall. Thoughtful and suggestive papers were read by Rev. Alfred Norris, Brighton, on The Paramount Theme of the Pulpit, and Rev. Edwin Joshua Dukes, Bridgwater, on The Pastor and the Young People, helpful discussion ensuing. Dr. Newman Hall, who attains his eightieth birthday May 22, took part and delivered a solemn testimony. The communion service brought a remarkable series of meetings to an impressive conclusion.

GEORGE ADAM SMITH IN BOSTON.

Of medium size and build, ruddy of complexion, erect and alert in posture is Professor Smith of Glasgow, who occupied the pulpit of the Old South Church in this city last Sunday, both morning and evening. A scholar of the first rank, there is little distinctively scholastic in his appearance. His is a face which one instinctively trusts as well as admires, and when it lights up, as it often does as his interest in his theme waxes strong, the ardor and insight of the prophet are discernible—the prophet of hope and cheer rather than the stern deliverer of warnings and denunciations. Certainly it is not too much to expect that one who has penetrated so far into the thought of the old Hebrew seers should draw from them something to accentuate his own message to the modern congregations that gather so willingly to hear him.

Dr. Smith read the Scriptures with singular impressiveness and his prayers were sympathetic and uplifting, the brief one before the morning sermon having a special pertinence to its position: "O thou who hast lifted us by prayer and praise unto the secret of thy presence speak unto us through thy own word, so that through all the working week we may still hear thy voice and gladly obey it."

Dr. Smith uses a manuscript but his delivery is exceptionally free and effective. He has a resonant, well modulated and decidedly agreeable voice. The literary charm and finish of his sermons were in accord with their intellectual and spiritual forcefulness, the simplicity and energy of style which characterize his books being manifest. He termed his morning text "a little song in the book of Numbers" [21: 16], employed by the drawers of water to lighten their toil, and from it he went on to point out the religiousness of common life. We shall print the sermon in full in an early issue.

The evening sermon started from the text, "While ye have the light, believe in the light that ye may become sons of light." It was characteristic, said the preacher, of Christ in comparing himself to the light to refer always to its practical usefulness. The analogy between the physical and the spiritual day was dwelt upon, the point being made that the night comes not merely to afford rest to the weary body, but to give intensity to life and a sense of the immediateness of duty. So the night becomes not only the liberator of the slave but the taskmaster of the free. Character has but a short summer in which to ripen. Man has a moral today but an irrevocable yesterday. Jesus is the great opportunity of life, but even he shares the qualities of definiteness and limitation which inhere in all moral opportunities. He will shine forever, but you and I have only this life in which to find him.

Dr. Smith set forth faith as a belief in Christ's practical effectiveness for this life and for that which is to come, and pressed home with evangelistic warmth and tenderness the question of one's personal and daily relations to him.

Dr. Smith spent a portion of the current week in inspecting the scenic and historic attractions of Boston and vicinity, going thence to Canada. This is his first visit to America, and after fulfilling a lecture engagement at Chautauqua he returns in July to Scotland.

CURRENT THOUGHT.

AT HOME.

Henry Norman, the British journalist, famous especially for his notable service rendered to the London Chronicle in connection with the recent diplomatic complication between our Department of State and the British Foreign Office, who was summoned to London from the Balkans and sent post haste to Washington, writes in the June Scribner on the political and social conditions In the Balkans. He says it is difficult, for many reasons, to write of Turkey today, because her political position is so uncertain "that the prophecy of today may be outdated by the fact of tomorrow." "Today Russia is guiding the sultan's hand, but this will not be for long, and on the very day I am writing I learn of a secret attempt he is making to secure in a measure England's good will once more. His effort will be in vain; no British statesman will ever again dare to propose the support of Turkey." He predicts that whenever the flame of war shall spring up in Europe the Balkans will catch fire.

President Hyde of Bowdoin College, in the same magazine, in a series of imaginary letters written by an American college student of today to his sister, father and mother, very clearly sets forth the mental and spiritual development of one who as a Freshman fails to get much out of the college church; as a Sophomore feels that Mill and Spencer, Huxley and Tyndall ought to be better authorities on the rules in the game of life than the "ingenious priests who enlivened the monotony of exile by drawing up an ideal code and attributed it to Moses"; as a Junior acknowledges Jesus Christ as Lord and Master, yet does not find the essence of his spirit and teaching either in traditional theology or conventional Christianity; and as a Senior announces that he has gone back to the Y. M. C. A., that he intends to connect himself actively with the church, that the cry "Back to Jesus" in religion is as foolish as "Back to Phidias in art," or "Back to Homer in poetry," and that he recognizes the church as "the organized expression of the life of the Spirit of God in the heart of humanity" and a spiritual necessity, which he can no more ignore in his efforts to serve God and his fellowmen than he could reasonably think of shouldering his musket and marching across the fields on his own account against an invading army.

Rev. Dr. J. G. Merrill, editor of the Christian Mirror, says that a wide observation of the life of several of our theological seminaries has made strong the conviction that they are beset with many perils, four of which he names: 1. The professors in our seminaries seem to regard themselves as the owners of the institutions which employ them and resent, very decidedly, any attempt to interfere with their imagined rights. 2. The narrowness of the world of men with whom they come in contact. No personal knowledge of the way nineteen-twentieths of humanity live tends to result in a type of mental and spiritual life that falls out of sympathy with the gospel of him who was a man among men. 3. The preponderance of the intellectual over the practical and spiritual forces in personal Christian life. 4. Lack of unity of aim or, to put the case more strongly or more truthfully, the presence of discord in the faculties of the institutions.

The Churchman, commenting on the suspension of Mr. Fuller from the ministry (since made deposition by Mr. Fuller's request) by Bishop Lawrence of Massachusetts, says: "It is a singular fact that the church in her canons deals only with marriage after divorce. She does not forbid divorce. It is an omission which ought to be remedied at the earliest moment. Christ himself forbade divorce, save for the cause of adultery. Certainly the church should do the same; should hand down and maintain and defend this teaching and this law of her Master. She should withhold her fellowship and privileges not only from those who are married contrary to God's law, but also from those who are divorced contrary to God's law."

The Herald of Gospel Liberty (Christian) says of the sect which it represents, and with which Congregationalists are asked to formally unite: "The Christians are not necessarily Congregational in form of government. We merely happen to be so, because of our free origin. Some of our churches almost seem to be Presbyterian, the official boards having such dominant power. If a conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church, retaining its Episcopal form of government, were to apply for admission to our American Christian Convention, it would undoubtedly be received without regard to its government, if it would thenceforth take only the name Christian, and make Christian character its only test of fellowship. That is, we do not denominationally emphasize form of church government, but character. . . . The Christians cannot be tied to any one form of government, any more than to any one dogma. Christian character is our sole test of fellowship."

ABROAD.

The British Weekly, commenting on Rev. C. H. Hamlin's recent article in our columns, Bicycles and Electric Cars versus Sunday, says: "A point which the writer does not suggest is that churches might do more in organizing Saturday afternoon cycling excursions. Cycling clubs are carried on with much success at several London churches, and these are noticeable for the large numbers of young men who attend them. The pastor who cares for the healthy recreation of his young people during the week will not find that they desert him on Sunday."

The Friend (Honolulu) detects a "conspicuous development within the Congregational churches" (of the United States) of what it believes to be a "most grave and serious departure from sound teaching in respect to the cardinal doctrine of Christ's expiatory sacrifice for sin." The root and source of "this deplorable error," it says, "seems to be in a lack of deep sense of the evil of sin."

It is somewhat surprising, though none the less gratifying, to find a Frenchman, M. Filon, writing in the Journal des Débats, defending Puritanism and saying: "Democracy can give us Puritanism, not the Biblical Puritanism of an elder day, but a sort of philosophical and scientific Puritanism. And of all forms of the religious spirit it is that which most readily separates itself from dogma. It does not find dogma necessary for its existence. Equality in happiness is a chimera, but equality in abnegation, in renouncement, in sacrifice, is always possible. If the great efforts which Puritanism demands of man will not conquer paradise on earth for him, they will at least mitigate some of the sufferings of the best souls on earth. And so I ask myself," concludes our ingenious French philosopher, "if that is not what is meant when it is said that more than any other a republican form of government owes its existence, its very subsistence, to individual virtue?"

DECORATION DAY.

Alas! the graves which no man names or knows;
Uncounted graves, which never can be found;
Graves of the precious "missing," where no sound
Of tender weeping will be heard, where goes
No loving step of kindred. O, how flows
And yearns our thought to them! . . .
But nature knows her wilderness;
There are no "missing" in her numbered ways.
In her great heart is no forgetfulness.
Each grave she keeps she will adorn, caress.
We cannot lay such wreaths as summer lays,
And all her days are Decoration Days.

—H. H.

A recent short story by Octave Thanet purports to have been written by a father for his little son, in order that the knowledge of his father's mistakes and subsequent atonement for them and of his mother's steadfast courage may have its effect on the boy's life as he grows old enough to appreciate such confidence. It is a great pity that something of this kind cannot be done for all children. Such records might also prove a wholesome restraint to the parents, but, be that as it may, we lose some of the strongest elements of patriotism through ignorance of the lives of our ancestors, commonplace though they were. Memorial Day brings to comparatively few the thrill of personal connection with the heroism of a generation ago. But there is hardly a family in whose annals there are not instances of rugged endurance, resistance to wrong, or a noble lack of self-interest that left its mark. These may not be significant enough to furnish material for the historian, but they form an inheritance of which no child should be deprived. Honest pride in family traditions cannot but strengthen the love for the fatherland. The Jewish nation should teach us the wonderful influence of such training.

VEXATIOUS CHILDREN.*

BY JOHN WATSON, M. A., D. D. (IAN MACLAREN).

Parents at times make a pretty pretense of indifference, but they are all aware that their satisfaction in life is bound up with the well-doing of their children. One would like to get the ear of children and suggest to them how much their parents' life—which means peace, hope, faith and joy—depends on their conduct, in speech and deed, in manner and bearing. If young people could only put themselves in their parents' place and imagine, wonderful things would follow. Some idler, who will not work from motives of fear or respect or ambition, might be spurred by love, if only to save his mother from reproach. Some thoughtless, selfish girl might deny herself whims and pleasures to bring satisfaction to the hearts of her people. Some young man might bear himself with a little more respect, and even condescend to give occasional information about his movements, if he had any idea of his father's feelings on certain occasions. Parents are kept at a distance, are denied proper confidence, have their convictions, wishes, tastes, if you please foibles, disregarded, look in vain for signs of affection and gratitude, have their just pride in their children humiliated, not because the children are bad or cruel, but only because it does not occur to them that, although they consider themselves independent of the old folks, the old folks are continually, willingly, pathetically dependent on them for what is more than living, or rather what is the heart of all living—for love.

Parents ought, however, to be sensible, charging themselves with the remembrance that youth is a stage in life that calls for much patience and tolerance. It may rather be taken as a process in the creation of character during which the wine is apt to be frothy and unpalatable. Persons about twenty—up or down—are often intoxicated with the first draught of life, and are neither what they were nor what they will be. They are hasty in their judgments, positive in their opinions, worshipers of idols, impatient of restraint, ashamed of old-fashioned ways, raised above the domestic affections and wiser than all the ancients. They will threaten to leave home to become writers, artists, teachers, or something not defined, only misty and grand. Their political, social and religious views may be amazing. This mightiness ought not, however, to be taken too seriously or made a cause of quarrel between parents and children. This is sowing wild oats after a harmless fashion, and the willful sower may be allowed some freedom without fear. His heart is sound, although his head be—for the moment—turned, and in a year or two he will laugh at himself openly. Do not let us call it vice, and lie awake of nights because our children, like other young animals, champ the bit and toss their heads and threaten to run away, when, with all their strength in them, they are first harnessed to the duties of life.

With years will come understanding and self-restraint; with years will reappear the homely duties and simple ways that were for a little despised, and forty-nine will settle down to honest work and filial piety. It may not be so with the fiftieth, and there shall be the heartbreak. In his ill-omened life the gayety and irresponsibility of youth deepen into insolence, idleness, viciousness and utter shamelessness. For a time his faults are excused; then they are covered; at last they are flagrant, so that the world knows what has befallen this home. Somewhere in a distant colony a son is living as in the far country, carrying beneath his degradation the traces of culture and religion. No acquaintance speaks of him to his people; his name is never mentioned in the home; all traces of him are removed; his mother alone pities and prays for him. His history is written, for those who can read, in his mother's face, in his father's humiliation. This is the secret chapter in many a family history; this is the black sorrow in many an English home, beside which worldly losses and bereavement are nothing.

The tragedy of prodigalism is often very perplexing and contradictory. One can easily find some home within his knowledge where a son received no training in religion, saw no example of piety, was brought up under no restraint. Yet, without a single aid to high living, he grows up dutiful, thoughtful, reverent, a lad any father would be well satisfied to call his son. By the laws of heredity and environment he ought to be a prodigal, but he is not; neither is he a Pharisee. He would be a very creditable product for a religious home. One can also lay his hand on some other home, where a son has been born in the line of faith, has been reared in an atmosphere of godliness, has been led into the paths of righteousness by a mother's influence, a father's authority. Yet, with everything in his favor, he breaks loose and sins grievously before man and God. He was expected to sustain the traditions of his house, and he might have been the son of a profligate. It is nonsense to say that the children of religious people, as a rule, turn out bad, and the children of irreligious people good; but Providence in many cases does seem to play at cross purposes with laws.

Prodigal is too strong a word to describe a large number of children who are, however, a constant trial to their parents. They are bad-tempered, sullen, disobliging in the home, or they are frivolous, light-headed, unstable, or they are extravagant, wasteful, luxurious, or they are deceitful, unreliable, scheming. Sons will not fall into their father's plans, although they be most just and reasonable, daughters will form unfortunate attachments, which can only prove disastrous and which the wider wisdom of older people would have prevented. It is one of the cruelest ironies of life that a man should spend the best years of his life in hard, self-denying, successful work to make a home for his family, such as neither he nor his people before him enjoyed, and that it should be made miserable for him by the disobedience, self-will and impracticableness of his children, that a man should amass wealth, every penny of which is a sign of industry and integrity, and that he should see it become an instrument of mischief—supporting incompetent sons in idleness and making his daughter a gilded bait for mean-spirited fortune hunters. The possibilities of joy and sorrow within a family are know only to God.

Given the best of children, there must be, from time to time, some vexation to the heads of the house, and one good of this discipline is to send them back on early days. Were we ourselves always docile, considerate, affectionate, understanding? Did we never try the patience of our elders? Did we never disappoint them? Did we never grieve them? We enter into their feelings now, when it is too late to ask their forgiveness, but not too late to be penitent. Nothing becomes men and women like genuine regret for the errors of the past. It fosters in us humility, tenderness and mercy. Prodigalism in children has often produced saintship in parents.

Does not our pain also give us an insight into the heart of the Eternal Father, whose children we all are and whom we have all grieved? When we read our own feelings, then we have the faint shadow of his whose love is ever wounded, whose patience ever waits, whose hope never fails. Between the earthly parents with their prodigals and the Heavenly Father with his there springs up a certain real sympathy, a certain community of thought. Both have suffered, both have made sacrifices, both have their reward in the future, both believe in the final victory of love. And our faint and despairing faith is caught up, established and crowned in him who watcheth, and will not cease to watch, till, from the wholesome misery of the far country in this world, or in that which is to come, the last of the prodigal children returns home.

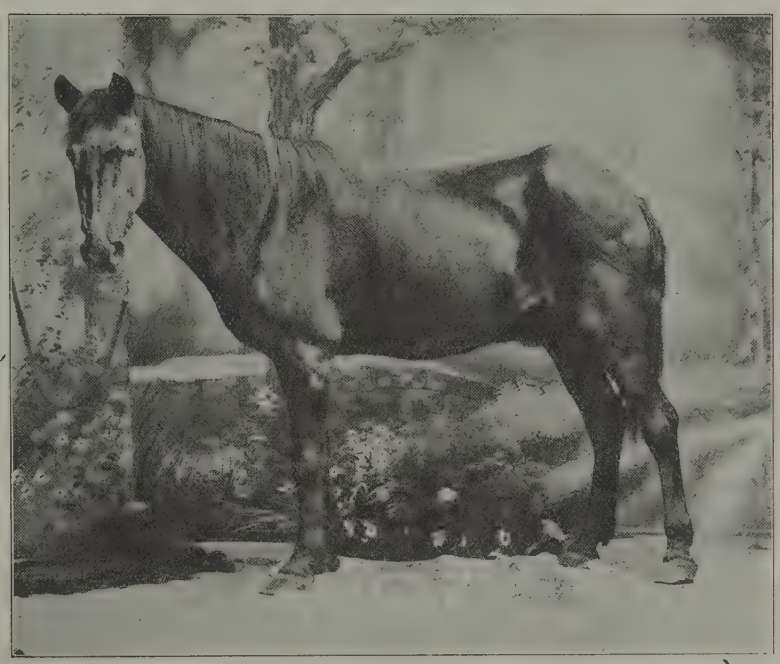
THE ONLY EQUINE SURVIVOR OF THE LATE WAR.

BY REV. JAMES L. HILL, D. D.

Since Bell Mosby died two years ago last March, full of years and honors, a single representative of the equine race—more solitary than Robinson Crusoe upon his island—remains a cynosure of the nation's eyes. He will march next to the band and flag in the procession of the John Braden Post, G. A. R., upon Memorial Day, and, if life is graciously lengthened out, will participate in the grand reunion and national encampment at St. Paul next September. If the custom of earlier Memorial Days is continued, he will wear on his back a robe of state inscribed on one side with the legend, "I am forty-one years old and am the only one left." On the opposite side would appear the statement, "Captured in 1864, served in Company C, 16th Pennsylvania Cavalry."

His age is reckoned "according to his mouth" at the time he was taken from the enemy, and his name is Ned. General Sheridan's horse Rienzi, or Winchester, as he was always called after



He seemed to the whole great army to say,
"I have brought you Sheridan all the way
From Winchester town to save the day," was accounted venerable when at half of Ned's age; dying in 1878, he stood aside "as natural as life" in the Military Institute Museum on Governor's Island. Unlike Rienzi, who was presented to Sheridan when made colonel by a Michigan regiment, old Ned was originally rebel. His owne was shot from his back in Gen. Jubal Early's raid on Washington in 1864. At night, after the fight, any Union soldier who had lost his mount was supplied with a horse captured from the Confederates and Ned was thus given to Mr. B. F. Crawford, a sergeant of ordnance, who travels in the same car with him when he journeys and cares for him when at home in a village northeast of Erie, called itself North East. Old Ned is now a thorough-paced Unionist. He is unqualifiedly reconstructed. So far from being a Jack o' both sides, he seems to have lamented his youthful vagaries, although observers imagine that he is uncommonly excited by the rendition of Dixie—such is the lingering power of early associations.

At the close of the war Mr. Crawford left Washington on Ned's back and rode him to Harrisburg. There he bought a sulky, and, putting Ned between the thills, they, rejoicing in the dawn of peace, made their easier way to a home that Ned has distinguished by his presence, where he is regarded as a piece of public property, and where he is pointed out every day as the most prominent resident. This contraband when captured was a bright black, but now, with advancing years, has grown grizzled; indeed, most of the hair on his head has become white. His saddle marks are strikingly noticeable and he, like many another contraband, shows the scars of his burden-bearing. No Roentgen rays are required to discover the more prominent portions of his anatomy. In his early life he "scorned delights and lived laborious days," but he is now treated like a pensioner. His life is a reminiscence. Having fought in the greatest army that ever marched to martial music, and for the best government that ever enlisted equine valor, he is thought to have earned four quarts of carrots three times each day and two quarts of bran.

He was at the Grand Army reunion at Pittsburg, but while his patriotic feelings are still intense his bodily constitution declines to endure the old-time strain and it was feared that this Napoleon of horses would end his career with the glories of that high day. At Louisville, out of respect to his years and infirmities, he was carried on a float, which was highly decorated and which everywhere received an ovation. As between the most eloquent orator of the country, as an attraction at a Grand Army reunion and old Ned, recognized everywhere by soldiers as the sole survivor of his race in the war, a claim that his owner says is undisputed, it is about "horse and horse." When at this Southern city a squad of Early's men from whom Ned was captured saw him, they threw up their hats in ecstasy and rushed up to touch the gallant steed. At his stable he was visited by thousands of Unionists, Confederates, women and children, many of whom desired a hair from his tail as a relic of the war. He was present last year at the unveiling of the monument commemorating the great railroad wreck at Ashtabula where the winning voice of P. P. Bliss was hushed to earth forever.

If the veterans of the Grand Army have any hobby it is old Ned. He is the chief figure in civic and patriotic processions. Old as he is his equine excellency does not feel himself in the wrong place on the thirtieth of May in the festival of flowers. Garlands of roses make up his caparison. Even the children seem indisposed to wait until this veteran is dead before they show their appreciation of his services to the Union cause. In his Morgan blood there seems to be a strong infusion of old-fashioned star-spangled-bannered Americanism and he is very sensitive upon matters that touch its expression. In all parades, having participated in them so often, he very properly insists on marching next to the music. Once it is said that for more pomp two veterans were detailed to lead him. At this he kicked and withdrew. Overtures were made to him but the fun-loving animal manifested his humorous propensities and having freed himself, enjoying his inalienable right to liberty and the pursuit of happiness, shaped his course for a detour through the historic town. Presently the veterans and old Ned, who is distinguished for his horse-sense—or, perhaps more properly, old Ned and the veterans—adopted a different scheme. When they, unaccompanied by him, returned to the ranks, the instant the band struck up, old Ned, so jealous of position, fell in behind the musicians and tramped peacefully to the graveyard, and as he progressed was far and away ahead of anything else in the procession as the chief factor in the demonstration.

But his dimmed vision and gloomy deafness, suggesting that the doors are being shut in the street, and his trembling limbs, to say nothing of the blind staggers by which he was attacked about a month ago, although not as severe as those from which he suffered a year ago, still remind us that the shadows of the end have already begun to appear.

Oft am I by comrades told,
Poor old Ned, thou growest old.

The very appearance of age is calculated to soften our hearts and to call forth our respect. No other picture happens to inflame my own imagination like that which will ere long be exhibited to a grateful and reunited republic. The last survivor of the Civil War, old, bent and gray, but tenderly cherished by a generation unacquainted with the Rebellion except by history, will stand to say: "I feel like one who treads some banquet hall deserted. My comrades have all gone down to their windowless homes." What pathos, what a compression of memories and suggestion will inhere in that one man whom God alone will elect to stand in that position of solitariness. Those who can enter the Grand Army of the Republic are a set number. They must have enlisted and been discharged from the United States service in the days of the late war. As elimination proceeds the diminishing ranks cannot be recruited, and thus some boy now living is destined to behold the last man, who will stand a solitary link bridging a newborn nation to a glorious past.

AFIELD WITH YOUNG NATURALISTS.

THE BLUE VIOLET.

BY MRS. S. J. BUCKLIN.

Great poets and naturalists have lived near to nature's heart. We read of whole days passed by distinguished men in company with brooks and birds. Observe, think, reason, young naturalists, if we are to roam the fields together. Observe nature in her various moods. Ruskin says she never does things twice alike. Learn to distinguish plants by their leaves, birds by their songs, clouds by their shape, and trees by their bark and habit of growth. Note also the season. Compare it year by year. Were the anemones in bloom earlier this year than last year? Do birds return at a certain date, be the weather cold or warm?

Remember, then, that May 10, 1896, Flora's procession was well under way, marching in regular order to the music of the bird band, Robert O'Lincoln leader, and Robin Redbreast first cornet. On it comes, an ever increasing troop of spring beauties that entrance the eye.

> Proud pied April, dressed in all his trim,
> Hath put a spirit of youth in everything.

April has been in a good humor this year. Smiles have been more abundant than tears and the "showers that bring May flowers" have been rare. Within six weeks certain flowers have sprung into life, bloomed and died. Already willows, elms and maples are in seed; hypaticas, cowslips, bloodroot and trailing arbutus have passed away. The law, "dying thou shalt die," holds in vegetable as in animal life. From the moment of birth death begins, and the life that now is leads daily to the life that is to come. Every flying seed holds a promise of new life and reproduction goes on continually.

Today, May 14, apple trees are in full bloom. The fields and meadows are bright with flowers. Botanists are deep in the work of filling their herbariums, and the source from which they gather is rich. More than forty varieties of flowers are now in bloom. From such a wealth of subjects it is difficult to select a flower peculiar to May. Every one knows the violet and every one loves it, but not every one knows that botanists distinguish 300 species of this simple little flower, which dwells in both temperate and tropical climes. Because of the delight of two bright city lads who roamed afield with the writer, this shall be the flower we will talk about. How their bright eyes sparkled when I pointed out a hillside blue with violets! Down on their knees fell the silent worshipers and began to pick the sweet blossoms, regardless of a torrid sun beating down upon them. Bob O'Lincoln, intoxicated with his own hilarity, poured a flood of melody from a blossoming apple tree. The soft west breeze danced merrily with every newborn leaf.

> All the broad leaves over me,
> Clapped their little hands in glee,
> With one continuous sound.

The common blue or field violet belongs to the genus Viola. A distinguished member of this family is the English sweet-scented violet, cultivated extensively in this country in greenhouses and much prized for its fragrance. The language of the blue violet is love and many a wooer delicately shows his affection by a bunch of English violets. The pansy, too, expresses "happy thoughts," or in bolder language, "I think of thee," and its name, from the French "pensée," comes from the drooping habit of the flower which suggests thoughtfulness. Burroughs heads his list of thirty fragrant wild flowers and shrubs common in New England and New York with Viola blánda, the sweet scented white violet, a denizen of our fields and meadows, speaking of modesty.

Side by side with the ever welcome dandelion, that "copies in gold upon the green expanse the stars of the midnight sky," appears Viola cucullàta, opening its flower by the wayside or on dry hills almost as soon as the fresh grass starts and whose stem at first is too short to satisfy the picker. Spring showers and sunshine encourage it to bolder growth and when May is well advanced it rivals in beauty its relatives in the woods and meadows. Wood's botany names fifteen species of violets belonging to the north temperate zone, including the yellow Viola rotundifòlia found in woodland from New England to Tennessee.

Viola sagittàta, the "arrow leaved" violet, is an early bloomer distinguished from Viola cucullàta by the shape of its leaves. Viola pedàta, or the bird's-foot violet, is a large, beautiful variety growing on hillsides, or in hilly woods, or on sandy waysides throughout New England. The petals are a pale blue, white at the base, without the purple shade seen in the field violet and are beardless and smooth. It blooms early in May before the common violet is out of bloom.

It is needless to speak of Viola tricolor, the pansy heart's-ease—the gardener's triumph over the "johnny-jump up" of our grandmothers' gardens. As a garden flower its laughing face is almost beyond compare in the cheery satisfaction one gains from a continued acquaintance. The art of the florist has brought it to a state approaching perfection in size, shape, color and vigor of growth. It is a universal favorite—the "ladies' delight," the boutonnière of the gay gallant, the comfort of the afflicted. It rejoices in cool weather. Our note-book records a friend who picked from her open air pansy bed, Jan. 14, 1892, one hundred and forty buds and blossoms after the snow melted.

Violet is one of the seven primary colors, red and blue combined. We read of violet wood, obtained in Guiana and used for turning, and of a violet shell, a mollusk of the genus Ianthina, having a shell of a fine violet-blue color, and of violet stones found upon high mountains, which, being covered with what is called violet moss, emit an odor like that of violets, which is long retained and increased by moistening them. The flower known as the "dog's tooth violet," yellow Erythronium, has no connection with Violaceæ, but belongs to the lily family. Lastly, we find in shops the candied violet, a confection of high value which seems a desecration of the modest little flower.

The roots of nearly all Violaceæ possess emetic qualities. While many species are cultivated for the beauty of their flowers, others are used in the preparation of medicine, and ipecac is said to be partly the product of a Brazilian species of Ionidium.

Closet and Altar

What Christ's prayer was all true prayers must be. You must pray with the great prayer in sight.

The more our soul's life really hangs on Christ's life as its Saviour and continual friend, the more real becomes to us the unquenched life of those who have gone from us to be with him.—Phillips Brooks.

We must make time to be alone with God. The closet and the shut door are indispensable. We must escape the din of the world to become accustomed to the accents of the still, small voice. Like David we must sit before the Lord. Happy are they who have an observatory in their heart-house to which they can often retire beneath the great heart of eternity, turning their telescopes to the mighty constellations that burn beyond life's fever, and reaching regions where the breath of human applause or censure cannot follow.—F. B. Meyer.

> Unto the glory of thy holy name,
> Eternal God! whom I both love and fear,
> Here bear I witness that I never came > Before thy throne and found thee loath to hear,
> But ever ready with an open ear.
> And though sometimes thou seem'st thy face to hide
> As one that hath his love withdrawn from me,
> 'Tis that my faith may to the full be tried,
> And I thereby may only better see
> How weak I am when not upheld by thee.

Is it at all unreasonable to suppose that the contemplation of God will yield us greater, more precious results than the consideration of anything or of everything in this world that he has made? You are wrapt in the study of mineralogy or botany or conchology; and have no time to spare for the cultivation of your acquaintance with God. . . . You, my friend, have a great dread of being found imperfectly acquainted with a certain literature and think nothing of devoting whole nights to the acquisition of it; but your conscience is visited by no painful sense of your defective knowledge of him from whom is every good gift. Indifference and ignorance are here indissolubly linked as are also knowledge and thirst for knowledge. "Then we shall know if we follow on to know the Lord."—George Bowen.

Never can we be so glad in anything that concerns ourselves only as in yielding our desires to God's perfect will.

Almighty, God, Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, Maker of all things, Judge of all men, we acknowledge and bewail our manifold sins and wickedness which we from time to time most grievously have committed by thought, word and deed against thy divine Majesty, provoking most justly thy wrath and indignation against us. We do earnestly repent and are heartily sorry for these our misdoings; the remembrance of them is grievous unto us. Have mercy upon us, have mercy upon us most merciful Father; for thy Son, our Lord Jesus Christ's sake forgive us all that is past, and grant that we may ever hereafter serve and please thee in newness of life to the honor and glory of thy name, through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

THE HOME AND THE SUNDAY SCHOOL.

The modern home expects altogether too much of the Sunday school. The business of the Sunday school is to welcome its scholars, to group them in classes, to provide intelligent and faithful teachers and to enrich, in such ways as it can, its exercise of worship and instruction. The business of the home is to provide the scholars, to prepare them with a knowledge of the lesson and so to supplement the instruction of the school that they shall come to recognize the value of it for the cultivation of the religious life. And the average home calmly turns over its business to the hard-working school and then wonders that it isn't done more successfully.

If Martin and Maria and the rest object to going to Sunday school today the home says, "Well, you needn't go if you don't feel like it, but it does seem strange that they can't make it so attractive that you would like to go." When Eric, who never thinks of studying a lesson, and Eva, who yawns or whispers through the session, show a deplorable ignorance of primary Bible facts the home complains, "It is too bad that they don't get teachers who can teach." And when Kenneth and Kate grow up without any love for the Bible or any interest in the Christian life the home sighs, "I can't see why my children should be so indifferent to religion. I'm sure they've been to Sunday school ever since they were big enough to walk there."

We want no blind partisanship of the Sunday school. It has its weaknesses, sometimes its faults. Its teaching is not always in accord with the most approved principles of pedagogy or an accurate knowledge of the lesson. There come occasionally misfits of teachers and classes. And a dull routine will be tedious in a Sunday school class as anywhere. Beyond doubt the Bible school is capable of improvement. But I want to say with every ounce of emphasis I can put into the saying of it that the greatest weakness of the Sunday school today is the weak support it gets from the home.

The home asks for religious education from the Sunday school with the same confidence that it demands a secular education from the public school, and yet refuses to the one all the aids it grants the other. If a word be said about dropping a Sunday school pupil into a lower class as a penalty for non-attendance or failure in the lessons, the home immediately protests: "That is out of the question. It is all I can do to get the children to attend now. You must not require anything of them. You must just make it as pleasant as you can, and we'll hope they will keep on coming and by and by get more interested." Or if the proposal be to grade the school upon the basis of Bible knowledge rather than the accidents of age or size or acquaintance, the cry goes up: "But it will never do to separate Tryphena and Tryphosa. They will leave the school if they cannot sit side by side. My children like to be in the class with those they go with outside." And when the appeal is made for parents to study the lessons with their children, to come into the school with them, the home throws up its hands at the impossibility. "Why, I have all I can do to get the children dressed and off without going with them, and as for studying the lesson I'm sure I don't know where I could find another minute for that. It seems to me that the teachers ought to inspire interest enough in their work to make the scholars enthusiastic."

Yes, to be sure, but what teacher in a public school, however bright and intelligent, would accomplish much with a class of average boys and girls if there were no rules as to attendance and attainment, no right to require anything and no power to separate the ignorant from the intelligent and the idle from the earnest? And how forlorn and helpless would that teacher be who, stripped of these reliances, found, moreover, that there was no strong influence at home to determine whether the scholar should be regular in attendance, to see that the lessons were studied, to express interest, to render help in those home studies and in every way to exalt the importance of the education the school had to furnish! If the home insisted that the public school should have but one rule, "let the scholar do as he pleases," what courage and alertness would be left in the teachers, and what results could be fairly expected? Could we look for anything more than comes from similar treatment of the Sunday school when, after a dozen or more years of such whimsey and indolent passing through its departments, one graduates to the exercise of his attainments, strong in the knowledge that in some one of the gospels is recorded the Sermon on the Mount, containing Beatitudes which he cannot repeat, that were uttered by One who fulfilled prophecies which he does not remember and could not find to save his soul?

But the home says to all this: "I am afraid that if I insist on attendance and study, and require the children to be as particular about the Sunday school as the day school, I shall create a prejudice against the Bible, and even against the church and religion, which may be lifelong." There is a possible danger here, especially with certain temperaments. But surely the danger of prejudicing children against the Sunday school by requiring them to be faithful to it is overestimated. For the most part the risk is slight if these habits are taught early and if there be the same kindly, reasonable and patient effort to show the need of Bible knowledge that is expended when there is restiveness under the discipline of the day school. If the entire home studies the lesson in loving family fashion, if the Sunday school includes parents and children, and if its exercises and interests are talked of, honored and encouraged in the home, there need be little doubt but that love can exercise the same constraint here that avails in other duties of life.

And there is a counter danger in the lack of such practical honoring of the Sunday school which is far more portentous, and which the home ought not to overlook. If there is plenty of time to get the children ready for a party, time enough, too, to work up the subject for the weekly club, and to take in every good lecture and concert; if there is determination to see that the children are trained for business and society; if close and directive watch is kept of their growth in knowledge and gracefulness; but, withal, Bible knowledge and soul culture are left to the accidents of impulse and convenience, it does not take an over-bright child to conclude that the home considers some things as absolutely important, and that the knowledge of the sacred Scriptures is not one of them.

If the Sunday school is to do its business well, the home must do its business well. If the Sunday school is to raise its standard of work and accomplishment, the home must raise its idea of the Sunday school and of Bible study. When the home studies the lesson, gets informed and so interested in it, the school will feel the impetus. When the teacher finds himself judged, not by some curious and irrelevant question put for a "poser," but by the clear knowledge of the passage under review and by the presence of scholars ready for its intelligent discussion, he certainly will be spurred to better preparation and teaching. We shall get in all our classes some worthy knowledge of this historic revelation in God's Word.

REV. W. E. STRONG.

Ease of manner must be gained early in life if it is to be genuine and not an affectation. Sensitive little ones readily become self-conscious and awkward if they are teased about their appearance and peculiarities. So we should be careful to avoid fixing their mind upon any defect and not criticise them too much. Gracefulness is largely a matter of confidence, and to make a child timid and fearful of giving offense in whatever he says or does is to place him at a disadvantage all his life.—Childhood.

The Conversation Corner.

DEAR GIRLS AND BOYS: Here are a few more names of new members which I think I will give you. The first must be one of the youngest on our list, for she prints her letter out in cap ital letters, and a capital letter it is!

WINTHROP, MASS.

DEAR MR. MARTIN: MR. T— SAID YOU WOULD SEND ME A CERTIFICATE. I LIKED YOUR SERMON ABOUT THE FIVE BOYS. MARION G.

Thank you, Marion. Editors who preach occasionally in the paper like to know their hearers' opinions just as much as Mr. T. or any other regular preachers! If I were a pastor I think I should be more pleased with what children thought of my sermons than with the comments of all the wise grown-up folks in the congregation. What a beautiful place you live in! I remember spending a Sabbath there on the breezy shore eighteen years ago on the Sunday that you will read this, but there was no (Congregational) church there then—I am glad you have one now.

EASTHAMPTON, MASS.

Dear Mr. Martin: I am six years old and I want to be a Cornerer. I have two white mice. We had two in Africa. ANNIE H.

I shou'd think that in Africa the mice would be black!

REDLANDS, CAL.

Dear Mr. Martin: Thank you for the picture of Pomiuk. He looks like a very funny little boy, and very happy, because he is smiling so in both pictures. The scrap-book came safely. I like it very much. Redlands is a very nice place. I would like to have you come here because we have plenty of room. It is pretty warm out here so you will not get any cold out here as they do in Boston. My grandfather will be very glad to have you come. Your loving little friend, EDWIN L.

And I would like very much to come and see your wonderful scenery, enjoy your fine climate and call upon the many Corner children in California, and I hope to do so in the future, if—!

The usual saying is, "From Maine to California"; the alphabetical order of our letters reverses the trip.

AUGUSTA, ME.

Dear Mr. Martin: I would like very much to belong to the Cornerers. I wanted a picture of Pomiuk very much when mamma read the Cornerers' page to me tonight. I will send you —— cents. I earned most all of it by drinking milk. I don't like it at all.

FLORENCE L.

To me that would be a most delightful way of earning money!

ANDOVER, MASS.

Dear Mr. Martin: I have been a Cornerer since Christmas. Some of the Cornerers may like to know how to make a tent. I was reading the other day in the "Seven Little Sisters" how Miss Andrews made one. I made one by the open fire. I took a clothes horse and turned it upside down and covered it with a rug. I inclose —— cents for Pomiuk, which I earned myself. ALLAN MCC.

How? By eating bread and milk? I should think that a tent on a horse's back might run away! But it is time to have tents out in the open air now, instead of by the open fire. I saw one today pitched not far from my home and a lot of boys around it.

NEWINGTON, CT.

Dear Mr. Martin: I want to be a Cornerer. I am seven years old, and my papa lets me write on the typewriter. My papa read me about the white cats and told me of a white cat he had when he was a boy. This cat went away when the scarlet fever was in the house. And they thought he was dead. But when the sickness was all gone the cat came back. He had been gone many weeks. And was fat and sleek. I have four little sisters. Their names are Ruth, Miriam and Sarah. We have not named the baby. Which do you think is the prettiest name, Lois or Rachel?

Your little friend, PAUL M.

They are both pretty names, much to be preferred to the soft and silly names that poor little children sometimes have to bear. I see that Cruden's Concordance says that Lois means better. If that is so, then that is the better name! (But ask your father if that is true.) On the other hand, St. Paul's Lois was an aged grandmother—would that be appropriate in your case? The Bible Rachel was a "beautiful" girl, which of course applies to your little sister. It is too great a responsibility you place upon me!

LA CROSSE, WIS.

Dear Mr. Martin: May I be a Corner boy? I am eight years old. I would like a picture of Pomiuk. I send you a picture of Sheppie and I. Your little friend, ALFRED M.

Thanks for "Sheppie and I." He looks as though he was taking faithful care of "I." I have letters too from Edith M. of Ohio and Mildred M. of Wisconsin.

As Memorial Day comes about the time you will read this, I will print a letter about war times:

WEST TISBURY, MASS.

Mr. Martin; Dear Sir: An old Cornerer was stirred by your reference in the Corner of April 2 to the "rustic chapel" of Meade's Station, for I had the pleasure of helping to build it. I wonder if your young readers know how we made it. We first dug a trench three feet deep, then secured and split a lot of logs about a foot through and set them up in the trench, side by side, and covered with a tent cloth. The seats were simply rough boards. The beautiful pulpit and the vestibule, surmounted with a steeple, were made mostly by a Prussian, I think, an officer of the 12th New York Battery.

I had the pleasure of preaching a dedication sermon there, Jan. 15, 1865, and the next Sunday of holding a communion service. Seventeen States and fourteen denominations were represented. How eyes moistened with tears and hearts went up in praise as thus, in the scenes of war, we kept the feast of peace!

H. P.

Yes, I remember about that dedication Sunday at "the rustic chapel." (I was not there, but heard a good sermon at City Point from Mr. Patrick of West Newton.) Two or three weeks later, I was "up front" and remember Mr. Moody coming in from the battle-field of Hatcher's Run full of earnest talk of what he had seen, and brother Farrington of Maine with his "coffee-wagon." After visiting Fort Sedgwick (the soldiers had another name for it), I spent a long evening at the Christian Commission quarters at Meade's Station. There was a wonderful prayer meeting in that same chapel, the subject being the 91st Psalm, and afterward a good talk with this very Mr. "H. P." of Martha's Vineyard, although he has doubtless forgotten all about it. Good old Deacon Field of Charlemont was there, too, and we heard the thick-flying shells before we reached home that night.

Since I began this memorial reminiscence I have opened the following letter:

READVILLE, MASS.

Dear Mr. Martin: Can any of the Cornerers tell me where I can find the poem written to Secretary Stanton by Miles O'Reilley during his imprisonment in war times, beginning:

Och, now, Mr. Stanton, our great god of war?

I saw it in a paper at the time, but have never been able to procure it. L. C. D.

I have other of O'Reilley's patriotic verses, but not that one. But doubtless some old scrap-book will have it.

Mr. Martin

CORNER SCRAP-BOOK.

Something About Ice. It may be a singular time now to think about ice (except in lemonade), but today's paper says that there are great quantities of it in the North Atlantic, which no doubt accounts for the icy winds of a few days ago. (I write two weeks before you read, remember.) Dr. Grenfell spoke of "heavy ice" in his sealing experience, and our St. John's stamp correspondent writes of a great blockade of it on the eastern Newfoundland coast. I have just clipped a short article on ice, and I will give you a few facts for your scrap-books. It is the army rule that two-inch ice will bear up a man, or properly spaced infantry; four-inch ice will carry a man on horseback; six-inch ice heavy field guns; eight-inch ice a battery of artillery; ten-inch ice a whole army. Railroad tracks are run with heavy cars in the winter over fifteen-inch ice. When floating, eleven-twelfths of ice is under water. Boys would do well to make a note of the "army rule," so that if they try to march next winter on one inch of ice they may expect to be twelve-twelfths under water!

Light in a New Place. Not on a bicycle, but on a gun. The Army and Navy Journal says that a "luminous foresight" has been patented in England. It is a little incandescent lamp run by a simple battery concealed in the stock, which, mounted at the muzzle of the gun, enables the shooter to aim more closely.

Light for a Club. Not a society club, but a policeman's club. This is a Western invention. A hollow head at the end of the club contains a magnesium pencil and other chemicals. When the holder wants a light he presses a spring which forces out the pencil and ignites it, so that he has a strong, bright light. Very few of our readers, I presume, are or wish to be soldiers or policemen, but it is interesting to notice how the mind of the Anglo-Saxon man seeks out many inventions.

Scales. That same mind has recently produced scales which are triumphs of mechanism. They are so nicely adjusted that, if two pieces of paper of equal weight are placed in them and an autograph written in pencil on one of them, the other side will ascend, the needle indicating a weight to the ten-millionth of a pound. A signature of nine letters weighed the fifteenth thousandth five hundredth part of an ounce, troy.

Trees. I think if I were a boy I would write at this season of leaves and blossoms a composition about trees—very old trees, very large trees, historic trees. A cypress in Lombardy is said to be the oldest cypress, and probably the oldest tree, in the world. There is a tradition that it was planted in the year of the birth of Jesus. Francis I. of France, when defeated at Pavia, in his despair struck at the tree with his sword, and Napoleon turned his great Simplon road from a straight line so as to avoid harming the tree. An eminent German forester says that pines in Bohemia and in Norway have reached the age of 750 years. A famous oak in Bavaria (at Aschaffenburg) is 410 years old. I have heard of a pine in Shrewsbury ninety-two feet high and fifteen feet in circumference, midway of its trunk. Do any of our correspondents there know its age? Have I not read of a tree in Worcester County that is in the exact geographical center of the State? The London Little Folks has a picture of ancient Saxon children dancing around an apple tree on New Year's Eve, singing this song:

Stand fast, bear well top,
Pray God send us a howling crop;
Every twig, apples big;
Every bough, apples enow;
Hats full, caps full,
Full quarter, sacks full.

LESSON FOR JUNE 7. Luke 22: 24-37.

WARNING TO THE DISCIPLES.

BY REV. A. E. DUNNING, D. D.

All the members of Christ's kingdom belong to his royal family. That conviction took possession of the disciples and has given a peculiar character to the teaching of the Christian Church. The song of the redeemed, which has found its way into all Christian hymnology, is that Jesus Christ "has made us kings and priests unto God." His promise to all his disciples is, "To him that overcometh will I grant to sit with me in my throne." But those who with him were founders of his kingdom strangely misconceived his purpose. At the very time when he took the first step in its visible organization by instituting the Lord's Supper as the sign of union between him and them, they disputed with each other for the place of highest honor in the new kingdom. This want of appreciation of his mission, which would have discouraged any merely human leader, he made an opportunity to communicate truth which might have made no impression on them but for its fitness to the things then in their mind. He used their contention as a background, set over against it pictures of what the kings of the nations were, of what he would have his disciples be and of what he was. He stated:

I. What constitutes the kingly spirit in his kingdom [vs. 25–27]? The disciples' idea of greatness was power to compel others to serve them. That was the popular idea. To the common mind this was not only the greatness of might but of right. The idea belongs with it that a king can do no wrong. The kings of the Gentiles exercised their lordship by making the people serve them, and they were called benefactors for doing it. The time is not yet wholly past when it is thought to be a virtue for a man high in office or great in genius to use common people for his own pleasure.

One of the most striking proofs of the divinity of Jesus Christ is that he reversed this generally accepted theory of right and the theory which he originated is conquering the world. Then he who compelled the most people to serve himself was accounted greatest. Today the ideal of multitudes is nearest approached by him who does the most valuable service for the greatest number. This was no mere theory with Jesus. He illustrated it in his own life which culminated in the sacrifice of himself on the cross for the salvation of the world. He illustrated it in that hour before his disciples by reminding them that he was their acknowledged Lord, then taking the place of a servant among them at the table, and thus making that office of highest dignity. He even took on himself the most menial service of bathing their feet [John 13: 1-6]. Having done this he was content to leave these seed thoughts to grow, clustered round the first events in the history of his kingdom. As his divine kingship should rise into supremacy in the minds of men the truth which made it divine would also rise and expand into power.

II. What constitutes kingship in Christ's kingdom [vs. 28–30]? To him his kingdom was his Father's gift to his only begotten Son. That gift he proposed to share with his disciples, "I appoint unto you a kingdom," he said, "even as my Father appointed unto me." They were to have a real dignity and authority in this present life. "Ye shall sit on thrones judging the twelve tribes." They were not then able to understand the nature of the kingship he bestowed on them. They were able only to receive a primary lesson in royalty. We can understand it better. We know that to possess the truth and live by it and to use such life to bring men into the image of Christ is to exercise kingly power—the power which will finally be supreme in the world.

III. The discipline which fits men for kingship in his kingdom [vs. 31–37]. Christ showed them that this discipline includes:

1. Enduring temptation. They had been loyal to him in his temptations [v. 28]. He would reward them with a share in the fruits of his victory. But they could enjoy it only through conquering temptations themselves. Such a victory they could win through strength that he would impart to them. Peter was the leader of the twelve. Therefore Christ addressed him by name. But he was not then fitted for the position he assumed. Therefore Christ addressed him as Simon, the name he bore before he became a disciple. Passionate, impulsive natures like Peter's possess the best elements of leadership when they have stood the test of discipline. They are capable of making their possessors mighty either for good or evil. Therefore the king of evil selects such for his severest assaults. He was about to put Simon through such a sifting process that even though he were true wheat the fierce wind of temptation would almost blow him away.

2 Christ's prayer for deliverance for the tempted. Satan desired all these disciples. Jesus prayed for them all and each one by name. He singled out Peter and addressed him that he might know, and that we may know, that no one's peculiar temperament or especial need escapes the notice of our abiding intercessor.

3. The occasions of severest temptations. The scenes and events of that night had intensified the disciples' love for Jesus till they were ready to face death with him and for him. So said Peter and so said they all [Mark 14: 31]. Then when they were most confident, when their emotions were at their hight, their overthrow was at hand. Before the next morning dawned they would all have forsaken him. When we are nearest to Christ temptation may be most powerful. When our spiritual natures are excited by heavenly visions they may be most liable to be swept away by passion. But Christ knew that this peril threatened Peter and guarded him, therefore, the more tenderly. The strength of temptation is itself an appeal to our deliverer.

4. The experience of self-dependence. The disciples would not grow into spiritual manhood so long as Christ was visibly present to make their decisions for them. It was expedient for them that he should go away. He reminded them that he had once sent them on a mission with a promise to look after all their temporal wants, and he made them testify that he had kept his promise. He then told them that he was about to send them on a longer service with far greater responsibility. They were to learn to exercise their authority in his kingdom when he, through his death on the cross, had founded the kingdom, and through his ascension had opened it to all believers. As the wise parent lays on his children increasing responsibility, withdrawing, even before they desire it, his direction of the minute affairs of their lives in order that they may learn to exercise authority over themselves, so Christ sends his disciples into life's battles with seen and unseen foes, compelling them to decide for themselves difficult questions on which their eternal destinies seem to depend. Yet they fight an enemy which he has overcome for them, they are guarded in their warfare through his unceasing intercession and they are safe because they are his.

THE CHURCH PRAYER MEETING.

PROGRESS OF THE KINGDOM.

OUR OWN WORK.

Protestants and Gregorians Fellowship. Gregorians and Protestants have evidently been drawn together by fellowship in suffering. Letters from the Harpoot district in Eastern Turkey report an extraordinary event in the history of Turkish missions. On the first Sunday in April the Protestant Christians were invited to hold a communion service in the Gregorian church at Mezereh, three miles from Harpoot. The building was crowded, hundreds being turned away for lack of room, and in the congregation were many who had been afflicted by the recent massacres, as well as several teachers and pastors from neighboring communities. The service of song was divided between the Gregorians and Protestants; then the Protestant pastor received fifteen new members into his church and preached an evangelical sermon. After an address by Dr. Barnum the Protestant service was closed, but the people were requested to remain, and the Gregorian priest made a friendly and gracious speech, expressing joy in the fraternal spirit which characterized the meeting and thanking the American missionaries for bringing a new faith and an open Bible as well as for their relief work among the suffering Armenians. Other addresses followed from both Protestants and Gregorians before the remarkable service was brought to an end. Such a mingling of the two sects would have been impossible a few years ago and would have been considered a pollution to the old church.

Secret of Turkish Resentment. The Constantinople correspondent of The London Daily News, in a discriminating communication regarding missionaries in Turkey, points out two reasons for the resentment against them manifested by the Turkish Government. This writer declares that no fault can be found with the American Board missionaries, whom he characterizes as centers of light through Asia Minor and whose influence any civilized government ought to welcome, on the ground that they mingle in politics or that they attempt to make converts among Moslems. The real secret of the Turk's animosity is that he instinctively recognizes that the education given by the missionaries places the Christians at an advantage in trade and even in agriculture, enabling thousands of Armenians to become comparatively prosperous. The agents of the government feel also that these missions, with their schools and colleges, their hospitals, their medical men and trained nurses, are symbols of the advance of civilization upon Western lines. The immediate cause for the outbreak against missions the English correspondent traces to the fact that the missionaries, Protestant and Catholic alike, have been largely instrumental in throwing light upon events in Armenia during the past two years and could not be prevented from telling the truth, so they are necessarily obnoxious to the government.

THE WORLD AROUND.

A Missionary Decorated. The emperor of China has conferred upon Dr. B. C. Atterbury, a medical missionary of the Presbyterian Board, the Imperial Order of the Double Dragon, second degree, a distinction which it is believed has never before been vouchsafed to any foreigner, excepting, perhaps, upon the ruler of some friendly power. This honor is a recognition on the part of the emperor of the American physician's services in connection with the Red Cross Society during the late war and of the successful efforts of Dr. Atterbury in advancing medical and surgical science in the empire. His services as a physician have been frequently in demand at the imperial palace, and when Prince Li Hung Chang set out on his journey to Russia to attend the coronation of the czar Dr. Atterbury was invited to accompany him as his medical adviser, but declined the honor.

After the War in Madagascar. It is a cause for sincere gratitude that the political upheaval in Madagascar has been attended with so little disaster to missionary activities. Even in the midst of the war there was little interruption of regular work, and churches and schools at the capital were closed but a few days. Of course, adjustment to the conditions of French occupation will be necessary on the part of the L. M. S. agents, and already new difficulties have arisen since the return of the Roman Catholic workers. Many of the Malagasy have been led to believe that they must now become Romanists since the French have conquered the country, for it is generally thought that "French" is synonymous with "Catholic" and "English" with "Protestant." "It is not to be wondered at," writes a missionary from Antananarivo, "that with ignorant and timid people the dominant idea is not which is the true religion, but which is to be the stronger? Great efforts are being made by the Catholics to get hold of the children from our schools and the young people from our congregations. Our brethren in the southern province are feeling this already and also our Norwegian friends in central Madagascar."

The arrival of Messrs. Lauga and Kruger of the Paris Missionary Society was timely and will do much to prove that there are Frenchmen who are also Protestants. The two delegates have been visiting the stations of the L. M. S., and have instituted a French Protestant service in Antananarivo for the officers, soldiers and others belonging to the Reformed Church, which is attended by the resident general, M. Laroche. That Madagascar will gain much in the line of material advancement by the French occupation is freely admitted. The authorities are trying to promote justice and religious equality. The L. M. S. missionaries agree that on the whole there are many cheering features in the new order of things, and are ready to work heartily with those now in power in the island to promote in every way the well-being of the Malagasy.

Work Imperiled in Persia. The future of the Presbyterian Board of Missions in Persia is even more problematical than that of the American Board in Turkey. To the American missionaries the shah's death comes as a real calamity. At no time in the sixty years of the mission have its agents been free from Mohammedan persecution or danger of assassination, and now, deprived of the protection of Nasr-ed-Dine, their situation is more insecure than ever. In event of two dangers which threaten Persia—civil war or Russian occupation—the lives and property of missionaries would be endangered, or they would be compelled to abandon their enterprise. The most important stations at present are at Teheran, Tabriz and Hamadan where the work is among the Armenians, and at Oroomiah among the Nestorians. This oldest station extends its operations as far as Mosul in Turkey, and takes in all of Kurdistan. The gospel is preached at seventy places each Sunday, to nearly 4,000 persons, nine-tenths of whom are in Persia. There are about sixty native Nestorian preachers beside the American missionaries. Among the important Christian institutions whose work is now imperiled are the Oroomiah Hospital and the College, which has theological, medical, college, industrial and preparatory departments; Fiske Seminary for girls, with normal, seminary, preparatory, primary and kindergarten departments; seventy-eight village schools in Persia and twenty-three in Turkey. These institutions have no less than 2,353 pupils under instruction, of which 756 are girls.

Radically Different Methods. Rev. E. H. Jones of Sendai, Japan, severely criticises, in The Missionary Review of the World for May, Mr. L. D. Wishard's book, A New Program of Missions, which has been widely read and received with much favor. Mr. Wishard's plan is to "convert the colleges of foreign mission lands into strongholds and distributing centers of Christianity; make them academies of the church militant to train leaders for the present crusade of evangelization." Mr. Jones thinks it a mistake to regard the Christianization of the world as largely a matter of men and money, and emphasizes the value of the old method of simply preaching the gospel, relying upon the Holy Spirit. His objection is, "Not that we would not have educated men to give themselves body and soul to the Spirit, as Paul did, but that we can organize an army of educated men—so many men to so many heathen so many years—and then rub our hands with satisfaction at the idea." As an illustration of the futility of such plans, Mr. Jones points to the Doshisha and to the Meiji Gakuin, the great Presbyterian Christian college in Tokyo, both of which are failing to provide preachers for the pressing work of evangelizing the masses. Instead of spreading Christianity by means of the higher educated classes, his advice is: "Let us look to God more expectingly for his Spirit to stir up the rank and file of the native Christians. From this revival preachers will naturally be evolved. When we find they have a mind to work, when they feel, 'Woe is me if I preach not the gospel,' help them to get for themselves an adequate intellectual preparation."

PRAYER MEETING.

BY REV. ISAAC O. RANKIN.

Topic, June 7-13. The Grace of Humility. Mark 9: 33-37; John 13: 1-17.

Some of the disciples wanted to be first in the kingdom of their Master, and seem to have thought much about it and disputed about the places of authority which they were to fill. Perhaps John and James had often hinted their desires before their mother came to Jesus and asked point blank that they might sit the one on the right hand and the other on the left in the kingdom.

Jesus answered them, not by forbidding their desire or discouraging their ambition, but by showing them what greatness in the kingdom really meant. They were thinking of authority, and he chooses a little child, who only rules the hearts of men by love. They were considering how they might control others and be obeyed by them, and Jesus takes a towel and girds himself and undertakes the lowest service, the menial service of a slave in the houses of the rich, to show them that true authority is authority to forget what the world calls dignity in ministering to the need of others.

None of the twelve could ever think of greatness after Jesus was gone from them without remembering the little child nestling in his arms in happy content, or feeling the touch of Christ's hands upon their feet as he bent before them in his humility and cleaned them of the dust of the street.

If this is the meaning of greatness and authority—if to be chief is to be as a little child, and to be first is to serve—there is no need to check or destroy ambition. The more ambitious a young man is the more service he will be ready to bring to those who need. It is safe to make the most of self, when self is to be used for others, but not till then.

A servile humility, always really thinking of self, such as Dickens pictured in Uriah Heap, is really a sort of pride. Even a genuine humility, which treats every gift as a trust and makes the most of it that it may be of the most use to others, may sometimes look like pride. But the test and rule is simple, and cannot easily or long be overlooked or mistaken. Real humility is Christlike, because like Christ it comes not to be ministered unto but to minister, and when it receives is thinking how it may serve.

BOOK REVIEWS.

Life and Letters of Oliver Wendell Holmes, by John T. Morse, Jr. In one or two respects Mr. Morse had an extremely difficult subject to handle in this book. In the first place Dr. Holmes, more than most authors, had already given the world a transcription of himself in his published works. It is the frank egoism of the Autocrat which makes its charm, and the same is true of practically every book which bears the name of Dr. Holmes. Even the life of Emerson, as Mr. Morse confesses, was anticipated more with a view to the biographer's opinions than of any hope of a deeper insight into Emerson's life and thought. When, therefore, Dr. Holmes's own life came to be written, his biographer found that there was practically nothing to be added to the picture which his subject had given of himself.

A few extremely interesting letters to close personal friends like Motley, Lowell, Mrs. Stowe and others, a more elaborate study of ancestry than Holmes himself had ever cared to make, a bit of fun and a touch of pathos added here and there to the treasured store, and some fuller statement of religious experiences and opinions —these constitute the chief additions to knowledge afforded by two carefully and lovingly written volumes.

Another difficulty was the almost complete absence of incident from the life to be depicted. In a very real sense the Boston State House was its center and, except for the early medical study in Paris and the brief tours connected with it, and the visit to England in old age, it was all spent in Massachusetts, and most of it in Boston or on the shores of Cape Ann. Holmes was no agitator, took little and belated share in the great public movements of his time, had but one purely intellectual conviction for which he was willing to labor and take risks and that was destructive and not constructive, began life as an aristocrat, with a somewhat narrow aristocratic contempt for common people, and appeared in public chiefly as the laureate of social gatherings in his own university and social circle. Here are no elements of a popular hero, and yet a popular hero he came to be and, in the special work of destruction to which he gave himself, he was at once the most brilliant and successful workman of his time, and the very egoism of his character and the narrow provincialism of his life were determining factors in his success.

He had that rare and priceless combination of wit and pathos which comes so seldom and holds such easy sway over men's hearts when it comes. He grew out of scorn into sympathy. He held fast to reverence while he attacked, with stroke on stroke of wit and irony, what seemed to him the inhumanities of a false conception of religion. He held the power of banter as light and graceful as that of a girl who teases her bashful lover and he could lead men up to hights of serious thought and fixed resolve. The wonder was not so much that a man should have arisen to write the One-Hoss Shay, but that he who wrote the One-Hoss Shay could also have written The Chambered Nautilus and "O love divine that stooped to share."

Before all other things Dr. Holmes was interested in heredity and perhaps in his own ancestral history he might have found the explanation of this human sympathy wider than his environment, the sense of quiet humor from his Dutch progenitors, the wit and reverence from the old Massachusetts blood, the clear brain and cool logic from his Connecticut father.

Religiously the embers of controversy which still burn in this volume are of little interest to us. Dr. Holmes rebelled too feverishly against the beliefs of his fathers ever to sympathetically understand them. For much of the work he did we have no regrets, but the problems he suggested are to be solved by methods different from those he knew or used in his controversial days. On this point the autobiographical bits which come at the beginning of Mr. Morse's book are not pleasant reading, they are too much like an old-fashioned polemical Unitarian sermon, but the letters to Mrs. Stowe which contain the most positive statement of opinions and belief are interesting and valuable.

If the book does not give us as much that is new of its subject as we would like we recognize that it is because "the Autocrat" had already in many books revealed himself so fully, and we are grateful for what is forthcoming. Mr. Morse, with the exception of a very few obtrusions of personal tastes and opinions, has done his work sympathetically and well. [Houghton, Mifflin & Co. 2 vols. $4.00.]

ESSAYS AND SKETCHES.

The mere announcement of a new book by Bradford Torrey brings delight to a host of nature lovers. If the title of this, Spring Notes from Tennessee, should be a disappointment to any New Englander who prefers to read about his own fields and woods, we are sure the feeling will be only momentary. He will be interested to know how our familiar summer birds occupy themselves on May days in Tennessee, as well as to be at home with some distinctively southern species. Many of these notes were taken on historic battlefields, making vivid the contrast between the horrors of those bloody days of '63, which names like Missionary Ridge, Chickamauga and Lookout Mountain recall to us, and the peace and quiet of the present. It is well to have all evidence of the conflict covered with grass and flowers, and the music of warblers and chickadees replace the roar of cannon and the groans of the wounded and dying. Mr. Torrey has a happy faculty of making us see what he sees, and of giving us characteristic glimpses of the people and their mode of life, while he tells of the birds to which his time was chiefly devoted. [Houghton, Mifflin & Co. $1.25.]

Renaissance Fancies and Studies by Vernon Lee. Mr. Lee's book ends with a valedictory from which we learn that he thinks his activity as student and writer closed and he writes the name of Walter Pater at the end of it, as in an earlier book he had written it in dedication at the beginning. Like Pater he is a student of the past and especially of the art and literature of the Renaissance, which he too approaches with the calm and reverence of spirit which alone promise great results. The first and longest essay in the book, on The Love of the Saints, is full of the results of thought and observation, perhaps the most original part of it being that relating to the reform of life which Francis of Assisi brought into the church in substituting joy for the terror of the earlier ages. The sketch of the influence of a prevailing Manicheism on the art of the earlier builders of Italian churches is very fresh and suggestive. Students of art, of human life and of church history will find much to interest them in this part of the book. [G. P. Putnam's Sons. $1.25.]

Little Idyls of the Big World, by W. D. McCracken. These are glimpses of foreign lands by a thoughtful American with very observing eyes. They suggest more problems than they solve, but in this are only true to the great sphinx—life. They will help to make the story of our own time vivid and distinct to many readers. [Joseph Knight Company. 75 cents.]

The Works of Friederich Nietzsche, edited by Alexander Tille, translated by Thomas Common, Vol. XI. This is the initial volume of the English edition of Nietzsche's works. "But one drift of thought pervades them all," says the editor. "Physiology as the criterion of value of whatever is human, whether called art, culture, or religion. Physiology as the sole arbiter on what is great and what is small, what is good and what is bad. Physiology as the sole standard by which the facts of history and the phenomena of our time may be tried, and by which they have to be tried and to receive the verdict on the great issue: decline, or ascent?" Taking Herr Nietzsche at his editor's word, tested by the contents of this volume, we find ourselves agreeing with Nordau that he is one of the "degenerates" and express our opinion without waiting for the other ten volumes. The book belongs to the sphere of intellectual pathology. [Macmillan & Co. $2.00.]

POLITICS AND ECONOMICS.

The Nature of the State, by W. W. Willoughby. The sub-title well describes this book as a study in political philosophy, which department is distinguished at the outset from sociology, economics, etc. The scope of the work is an investigation of the origin, nature, powers and aims of the state. Among the multitude of books on similar topics that have been put forth in recent years this is one of the few to be carefully studied; it may be classed with Bluntschli's Theory of the State, and Burgess's Political Science (both which it often cites), also with Giddings's Principles of Sociology, which did not appear in time to be cited.

The author is a lecturer at Johns Hopkins University. His extensive range of reading, in French and German as well as English authorities, is apparent throughout the book. Equally so is his independent judgment; in fact, his philosophy of the state seems to accord exactly with that of no one else.

The primary essential element of the state he holds to be a simple feeling in a given sum of individuals, which creates community and mutuality of interest. But he regards it equally essential that this feeling find expression in the erection of a common governing authority. Yet the state is not here confounded with the government, back of which it stands and under which it lies. The state endures through all changes of the government. The sovereignty of the state is indivisible and illimitable; that of a weak state is as absolute as that of a strong one.

Chapter 7, on the Nature of Law, and chapter 8, on Analytical Jurisprudence, we have found especially interesting. The logic of the book is much superior to the style. This last is heavy, inelegant and often incorrect; for example, the sentence ending on the middle of page 102 asserts the contrary of what is meant. These faults should be corrected in the later editions which we hope will be called for. [Macmillan. $3.00.]

State Railroad Control, by F. H. Dixon. This is perhaps the most important contribution to railroad literature since Charles Francis Adams's book: Railroads, Their Origin and Problems. Its method is largely historical, massing the teachings of experience upon the conclusion that (owing to difference of locality, etc.) no single method of governmental control of transportation can furnish a general panacea, but that the most practical results would ensue from a union of State commissions with direct national supervision. The facts cited are certainly striking and may well give pause to the laissez faire school of economists. Prof. Henry C. Adams furnishes an introduction. [T. Y. Crowell & Co. $1.75.]

To those who can follow it the history of taxation is as interesting as a novel and in variety of experience hardly anywhere more varied and suggestive than in the brief record of our own Government. In Taxation and Taxes in the United States under the Internal Revenue System, Frederic C. Howe has given us an interesting and useful history of this side of governmental activity which illustrates at once the strength and weakness of our methods of taxation. It shows how our untrained Secretaries of the Treasury have groped their way to great results, and, on the other hand, that there are great reserves of taxable wealth which may be drawn upon in a national emergency. The book is hardly written up to date, as it takes no account of the recent decisions of the Supreme Court interpreting the direct tax clauses of the Constitution, and of the consequent abortive experiment of the income tax established by the last Congress, and it is grievously crippled by the absence of an index—an omission which seems to us quite incomprehensible in a book of this character. [Thomas Y. Crowell & Co. $1.75.]

A compact and well-indexed Handbook on Currency and Wealth has been prepared by George B. Waldron, statistical editor of The Voice. It is bound in limp cloth with rounded corners for the pocket and contains useful tables and diagrams illustrating its topic. [Funk & Wagnalls Co. 50 cents.]

STORIES.

Cinderella and Other Stories, by Richard Harding Davis. There are five stories in this well-made book, and the title story is in the familiar Van Bibber vein. The Editor's Story is clever and no doubt true—it ought to be if it is not—and the Reporter who Made Himself King is admirable fooling. There is a touch of human nature throughout, which brings the author's narrative skill and humor to a very high point of literary art. [Charles Scribner's Sons. $1.00.]

Out of Town, with illustrations by Rose Emmet Sherwood, as its title-page reads, leaves us a little in doubt as to whether author and illustrator are one, but inclines us to that belief from the harmony between the story and the pleasing pictures that at once embellish and explain it. A young Englishman is won by the charms of a fair American, who lives with her married sister in a suburban town, and their love affair is the raison d'être for a bright little story of everyday life, in a family of ordinary occupations, habits, tastes and conversation. There is a piquant quality in the character of the descriptions that has its charm, and a novelty in the make-up of the book, its chapters being divided by a page blank but for two or three words, making each seem like a new story. [Harper & Bros. $1.25.]

The well-worn theme of an innocent man placed in an unfortunate position, implicating him as chief actor in a dreadful crime, is the basis of the story of A Ruthless Avenger, by Mrs. Conney. His escape and the devotion of years of his life to bringing the real criminal to justice form a readable and interesting tale. [J. B. Lippincott Co. $1.00.]

A Gentleman's Gentleman, by Max Pemberton, is the record of the life of a chevalier d'industrie, presumably written by his valet, wherein he alternately succeeds and fails in questionable practices, always, however, escaping punishment for his misdeeds. One of the characters tells a fantastic story of his own experience, showing great power of imagination in the author. There are likewise accounts of an opium den in Paris, and a fearful duel fought in Russia by an old-time code, probably not wholly imaginative, but wholly appalling. [Harper & Bros. $1.25.]

A fair young maiden displaying a childish aptitude for tears, but a great amount of strength in concealing her identity as child of a man guilty of enormous frauds and a refugee from justice, is heroine of A Rogue's Daughter, by Adeline Sergeant. The story is of a class dealing with results of a secret, hidden through fear, when openness was the only honorable course, disaster following from lack of fair dealing. [Frederick A. Stokes Company. $1.00.]

The Captured Cunarder, An Episode of the Atlantic, by William H. Rideing. This is a bright story—a dream of what might be accomplished by an Irish revolutionary party in the way of revenge for Ireland's wrongs if the events could happen in the right order to the right sort of leaders. Granted its premises the book is well and naturally carried out to the end, and is very entertaining. [Copeland & Day. 75 cents.]

The Light That Lies, by Cockburn Harvey, is a puerile attempt at wit in recording the flirtations of an engaged man with several married women. The literary form is quite as weak and faulty as the subject matter, and a perusal of the book is sheer waste of time. [J. B. Lippincott Co. 75 cents.]

FRENCH AND GERMAN.

French texts recently received for school and college use are: Victor Hugo, Les Misérables, abridged, with introduction and notes, by Prof. F. C. de Sumichrast of Harvard. This takes the masterpiece of the greatest of modern French writers and makes it available by careful selection and excision for school use. It will prove, we hope, an introduction to the book itself. The editor's introduction is brief and good. [Ginn & Co. $1.10.]——Le Chirurgien de Marine par Emile Souvestre, edited by Arthur H. Solial of Chicago, is a dramatic and interesting story and has been edited carefully and provided with full notes and vocabulary. [Maynard, Merrill & Co. 20 cents.]——Le Chien de Brisquet and other stories, edited for school use by L. C. Syms. These are brief and easy stories by seven different authors, giving variety of modern French style, and provided with a vocabulary. [American Book Co. 35 cents.]——La Tâche du Petit Pierre par Jeanne Mairet (Madame Charles Bigot), arranged for reading classes by Edith Healy. This popular and charming story for children was crowned by the French Academy. The work of the reader is made as easy as possible in order to allow the individuality of the teacher free play. Questions and answers for practice follow each chapter and there is a full vocabulary. [American Book Co. 35 cents.]

German texts are: Wissenschaftliche Vorträge von Emil Du Bois-Raymond, edited with introduction and notes by James Howard Gore of Columbian University. It is a good thought to employ a specimen of the best modern scientific German as a text-book for advanced students, and these lectures of Prof. Du Bois-Raymond are admirably adapted to the purpose. The work of editing seems to be very well done. [Ginn & Co. 55 cents.]——Immensee, by Theodor Storm, edited by H. S. Beresford-Webb. This is a well-printed edition of a famous and delightful little book carefully adapted by grammatical and explanatory helps to the use of beginners. [Maynard, Merrill & Co. 40 cents.]——Legends of German Heroes of the Middle Ages, by Prof. Johannes Schrammen, edited by A. R. Lechner. This is an elementary adaptation from the epic traditions of the Germanic peoples, the Niebelungen Lied, Roland Sage, Dietrich von Bern and Gudrun. It perhaps carries American children rather far afield, but might be made very interesting by a skillful teacher. [Maynard, Merrill & Co. 40 cents.]——Fritz auf Ferien von "Hans Arnold," edited by A. W. Spanhoofd. This bright story of a German boy's holiday seems well adapted for use in teaching simple colloquial German. It is carefully edited and beautifully printed. [D. C. Heath. 20 cents.]

MISCELLANEOUS.

Mr. William Willard Howard has prepared a little book which he calls the Horrors of Armenia, the Story of an Eye-Witness. Speaking with the experience of nearly a year and a half of personal observation and investigation, Mr. Howard's words are weighty, and as he is not a missionary, perhaps he may get a hearing in prejudiced quarters. We hope the book may have a wide reading and help to rouse an indignation which shall compel our sluggish Government to consider the question of the safety of Americans in Turkey a pressing one, and the rebuke of Turkish cruelty within the proper field of diplomacy. The book is sold for the benefit of the Armenian relief fund. [Armenian Relief Association: New York. 10 cents.]

Another and larger book on the same topic is Turkey and the Armenian Atrocities, by Rev. Edwin Munsell Bliss. Dr. Bliss has had the assistance of Cyrus Hamlin, Professor Grosvenor of Amherst, Dr. Labaree and others, and the introduction is by Frances E. Willard. He has made a book which is full of interesting information in regard to Turkey and its government and people. He surveys the field with the skill of adequate knowledge and points out both the necessity and the difficulties of reform. As a handbook of the history and present condition of the Orient, and of the forces at work for change both of good and evil, the book is to be highly commended, and the illustrations are well-selected and clearly printed photo-engravings of places and people which will be very helpful to the reader. [Hubbard Publishing Co. and George M. Smith & Co. Boston. $1.50.]

Miss Agnes McAllister tells in a simple, informal way the story of her six years' work on the Kroo Coast at the Garraway station of Bishop Taylor's Liberian Mission in A Lone Woman in Africa. The book contains interesting pictures of native character and customs, but one cannot help wishing that the author had written more about missionary activities and given less space to her bill of fare and other trifling details of her daily life. [Hunt & Eaton. $1.00.]

NOTES.

—— It is said that Mr. Rudyard Kipling means to take up his residence in England.

—— Mr. Swinburne's new poem, soon to be issued by the Scribners, is a modernization of Sir Thomas Mallory's Balen.

—— It is proposed to celebrate the 400th anniversary of the birth of Melancthon next February at his birthplace, Brettin in Baden.

—— The Literary Digest says that Gladstone has written such a vast number of letters during his life that his autographs bring only sixpence in the English market.

—— In the excavations of the American School on the site of Corinth the ancient city has been found at a considerable depth below the surface, and already some interesting discoveries have been made.

—— The Critic, in commenting upon two stories written by Count Tolstoi's son and namesake, is unkind enough to say that they "incline us more than ever to the belief that genius occasionally skips one generation."

—— The plan to preserve a part of Lowell's Elmwood estate as a park is making progress, but the money to complete the purchase must be secured by June 15. Cambridge is to be congratulated on the probable success of the plan.

—— Mr. Blackmore, in a letter published in the New York Tribune, says that "for two years Lorna Doone dropped dead and three-fourths of the first edition was transported—Botany Bay took it for waste paper." And now book lovers would be glad to pay round prices for those first editions.

—— Now that the newspapers of the baser sort and those who are thoughtless about the effect of their attempts at sensation have had their say, it will be in order to express our entire approval of the course of Mr. Rudyard Kipling, so far as we can gather the facts of the matter, in his attempt to rid himself of the annoyance to which he had been subjected, and to regret that he should have had so disagreeable an experience in America.

—— "Speaking of Mr. Frank Stockton," says The Bookman, "reminds us of a little tilt that we once overheard between him and Mr. Rudyard Kipling. The two gentlemen met at an authors' reception, and after some preliminary conversation Mr. Stockton said: 'By the way, Kipling, I'm thinking of going over to India some day myself.' 'Do so, my dear fellow,' replied Mr. Kipling, with a suspicious warmth of cordiality. 'Come as soon as ever you can! And, by the way, do you know what we'll do with you when we get you out there away from your friends and family? Well, the first thing will be to lure you out into the jungle and have you seized and bound by our trusty wallahs. Then we'll lay you on your back and have one of the very biggest elephants stand over you and poise his ample forefoot directly over your head. Then I'll say in my most insinuating tones, "Come now, Stockton, which was it—the Lady or the Tiger?" What would you do then?' 'O, well, that's easy enough. I should tell you a lie.' 'Thanks, awfully! That's just as good as the truth, now that you've told me that it's to be a lie. If you say "the Tiger" I'll know it was the Lady, and if you say "the Lady" I'll know it was the Tiger. Good!'"

GLEANINGS FROM OUR MAIL BAG.

THAT WALLED GARDEN AGAIN.

In recent Congregationalists my application for admission to the presbytery is characterized as warranted by neither courtesy nor prudence. You say, "Mr. Vrooman seems to have shown singular ignorance of the history and standards of the denomination into which he asked to be received, extending even to ignorance of the fact that he was to be examined in theology. . . . Congregational ministers should remember that the Presbyterian Church is a walled garden, and that they ought to know something about the dimensions of the gate if they wish to enter it."

As a matter of fact, I have discovered in six months' very close association with some members of the Chicago Presbytery, with whom I have been working, that it contains ministers who are much more radical than I am concerning the very points called into question in my own case. They have grown to this position since their admission to presbytery, and are left unquestioned, but the admission of a man holding substantially the same views is a different matter, and is so understood to be. A Presbyterian minister has just written me that if all men with my views should be expelled from presbytery there would not be a baker's dozen left. I am, generally speaking, in accord with the whole "new school" of the Presbyterian Church and the great majority of Presbyterians whom I have met, and there is no inconsistency in my seeking to join that body.

This, however, is not so much what I desired to call your attention to as to the statement of my ignorance of the fact that I should be examined. I did not seek admission without making inquiry as to whether I should be examined, and I was told by the man of whom I asked, a lifelong Presbyterian and a very noted minister, that my credentials from the Congregational church would be received without question or comment, that I would be asked to accept a few formal statements (which I have easily done), that there would be no semblance of examination and that the whole proceeding from my application to my acceptance would be a fifteen minute affair. My informant may have been mistaken, although he has had years of experience in Presbyterian usage, or my case may have received exceptional treatment. In any case I had every reason to believe that I knew the exact dimensions of the gate I wished to enter. In view of the facts cited I hope you will correct an impression, hurtful to me, which has been spread through the Congregational body. F. B. Vrooman.

IAN MACLAREN.

A few weeks ago The Congregationalist stated that "Dr. Cuyler was catching it" for his criticisms on "Ian Maclaren"—though I have not happened to see any of the papers which contained those castigations. My criticism was in a very cordial and courteous vein, and I simply protested against Dr. Watson's assertion in his essay on Jesus as our Supreme Teacher, that the "only creed of Christendom which has the authority of Christ himself is the Sermon on the Mount;" that alone is the "constitution of Christianity!" In this astounding assertion Dr. Watson ignores all our Lord's teachings on the fundamental truths of regeneration, the love of God in redemption, faith in Christ, the resurrection and eternal life! He planted himself squarely on the platform occupied by the great mass of Unitarians on both sides of the water; and while I paid almost extravagant eulogy upon "Ian Maclaren's" genius as a novelist I protested courteously against his un-Presbyterian and un-evangelical utterances.

But my demurrer was only a love-tap in comparison with Dr. Joseph Parker's tremendous bombardment of Dr. Watson's new volume, The Mind of the Master, in the last issue of the British Weekly. He justly assails the book (in which Jesus as our Supreme Teacher is only the first chapter) as antagonistic to the most widely accepted "standards" of all evangelical churches. No doctrine has suffered more painful evisceration at the hands of Dr. Watson than the central and vital doctrine of the atonement.

Whatever Dr. Parker's feelings may have been, I can honestly say that it gave me positive distress to utter a syllable of adverse criticism upon the utterances of so brilliant and charming a writer as "Ian Maclaren." I do not belong to the tribe of heresy-hunters; and I yield to no man in admiration of the Scotch stories which fairly rival old Sir Walter at his best. But Ian Maclaren had better stick to his Bonnie Brier-Bushes, and not venture into the domain of dogmatics. Certain it is that if he is right in his theology, then all the great lights of Scottish Presbyterianism—Dr. Chalmers, Dr. Guthrie, Dr. Candlish, Dr Hamilton, Dr. Cairns and Dr. McCosh—were all sadly in the wrong. The lovable Dr. Watson is an ordained Presbyterian minister, and it is a fair question of ethics how far a minister is justifiable in wearing the ecclesiastical livery of this denomination while he is openly dissenting from many of the fundamental declarations of that denomination's Confession o Faith. The extent of my offending—for which I have been "catching it"—is that as a veteran Presbyterian minister I entered a courteous protest against what I conscientiously regarded as a surrender of vital evangelical truth by a brilliant and beloved brother in the Presbyterian household.

Brooklyn, May 20. Theodore L. Cuyler.

A TRUE MOTHER.

It gives us much pleasure to be able to correct, through such indisputable evidence as that which follows, a widespread but erroneous impression:

The Congregationalist, April 9, criticises Mrs. Booth-Tucker's action in leaving behind her baby boy when she came to this country, and beg to point out several grave errors in the statement of fact:

1. Mrs. Booth-Tucker's baby was not ill when she left it. It had always been delicate but was apparently better at that time.

2. She received news of its sudden and serious illness off Queenstown. Since it was pitch dark and a heavy sea was on, the captain of the vessel refused to allow her, because she was a woman, to risk going down the ship's side. Her husband was permitted to do so, however, and returned to his child.
